Such an interest must surely be the First Amendment protection of a confidential relationship that I have discussed above in Part I. As noted there, this protection does not exist for the purely private interests of the newsmen or his informant, nor even, at bottom, for the First Amendment interests of either partner in the newsgathering relationship.[24] Rather it functions to insure nothing less than democratic decisionmaking through the free flow of information to the public, and it serves, thereby, to honor the "profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide-open." New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S., at 270.

In striking the proper balance between the public interest in the efficient administration of justice and the First Amendment guarantee of the fullest flow of information, we must begin with the basic proposition that because of their "delicate and vulnerable" nature, NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 433, and their transcendent importance for the just functioning of our society, First Amendment rights require special safeguards.

A

This Court has erected such safeguards when government, by legislative investigation or other investigative means, has attempted to pierce the shield of privacy inherent in freedom of association.[25] In no previous case have we considered the extent to which the First Amendment limits the grand jury subpoena power. But the Court has said that the "Bill of Rights is applicable to investigations as to all forms of governmental action. Witnesses cannot be compelled to give evidence against themselves. They cannot be subjected to unreasonable searches and seizures. Nor can the First Amendment freedoms of speech, press . . . or political speech and association be abridged." Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 188. And in Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, it was stated: "it is particularly important that the exercise of the power of compulsory process be carefully circumscribed when the investigative process tends to impinge upon such highly sensitive areas as freedom of speech or press, freedom of political association, and freedom of communication of ideas." Id., at 245 (plurality opinion).

[24] Although there is a longstanding presumption against creation of common law testimonial privileges, United States v. Bryan, 339 U.S. 323, 331, these privileges are grounded in an "individual interest which has been found . . . to outweigh the public interest in the search for truth" rather than in the broad public concerns which inform the First Amendment. Id., at 331.

[25] The protection of information from compelled disclosure for broad purposes of public policy has been recognized in decisions involving police informers, see Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, United States v. Ventresca, 380 U.S. 102, 108, Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 114, McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300, and military and state secrets, United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1.

The established method of "carefully" circumscribing investigative powers is to place a heavy burden of justification on government officials when First Amendment rights are impaired. The decisions of this Court have "consistently held that only a compelling state interest in the regulation of a subject within the state's constitutional power to regulate can jusify limiting First Amendment freedoms." NAACP v. Button, 371 U. S. 415, 438. And "it is an essential prerequisite to the validity of an investigation which intrudes into the area of constitutionally protected rights of speech, press, association and petition that the state show a substantial relation between the information sought and a subject of overriding and compelling state interest." Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee, 372 U. S. 539, 546 (emphasis supplied). See also DeGregory v. Attorney General of New Hampshire, 383 U. S. 825; NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449; Sweezy, supra; Watkins, supra.

Thus, when an investigation impinges on First Amendment rights, the government must not only show that the inquiry is of "compelling and overriding importance" but it must also "convincingly" demonstrate that the investigation is "substantially related" to the information sought.

Governmental officials must, therefore, demonstrate that the information sought is clearly relevant to a precisely defined subject of governmental inquiry. Watkins, supra; Sweezy, supra.[26] They must demonstrate that it is reasonable to think the witness in question has that information. Sweezy, supra; Gibson, supra.[27] And they must show that there is not any means of obtaining the information less destructive of First Amendment liberties. Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479, 488; Louisiana ex rel. Gremillion v. NAACP, 366 U. S. 293, 296–297.[28]

These requirements, which we have recognized in decisions involving legislative and evecutive investigations, serve established policies reflected in numerous First Amendment decisions arising in other contexts. The requirements militate against vague investigations which, like vague laws, create uncertainty and needlessly discourage First Amendment activity.[29] They also insure that a legitimate governmental purpose will not be pursued by means that "broadly stifle fundamental personal liberties when the end can be more narrowly achieved." Shelton, supra, at 488.[30] As we said in Gibson, supra, "Of course, a legislative investigation—as any investigation—must proceed 'step by step,' . . . but step by step or in totality, an adequate foundation for inquiry must be laid before proceeding in such a manner as will substantially intrude upon and severely curtail or inhibit constitutionally protected activities or seriously interfere with similarly protected associational rights." Id., at 557.

[26] As we said in Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178:
"[W]hen First Amendment rights are threatened, the delegation of power to the [legislative] committee must be clearly revealed in its charter. . . . It is the responsibility of the Congress . . . to insure that compulsory process is used only in furtherance of a legislative purpose. That requires that the instructions to an investigating commitee spell out the group's jurisdiction and purpose with sufficient particularity. . . . The more vague the committee's charter is, the greater becomes the possibility that the committee's specific actions are not in conformity with the will of the parent House of Congress." Id., at 198–201.

[27] We noted in Sweezy v. Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234:
"The State Supreme Court itself recognized that there was a weakness in its conclusion that the menace of forcible overthrow of the government justified sacrificing constitutional rights. There was a missing link in the chain of reasoning. The syllogism was not complete. There was nothing to connect the questioning of the petitioner with this fundamental interest of the state." Id., at 251 (emphasis supplied).

I believe the safeguards developed in our decisions involving governmental investigations must apply to the grand jury inquiries in these cases. Surely the function of the grand jury to aid in the enforcement of the law is no more important than the function of the legislature, and its committees, to make the law. We have long recognized the value of the role played by legislative investigations, see, e.g., United States v. Rumely, 345 U.S. 41, 43; Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 111–112, for the "power of Congress to conduct investigations is broad . . . [encompassing] surveys of defects in our social, economic or political system for the purpose of enabling Congress to remedy them." Watkins, supra, at 187. Similarly, the associational rights of private individuals, which have been the prime focus of our First Amendment decisions in the investigative sphere, are hardly more important than the First Amendment rights of mass circulation newspapers and electronic media to disseminate ideas and information, and of the general public to receive them. Moreover, the vices of vagueness and overbreadth which legislative investigations may manifest are also exhibited by grand jury inquiries, since grand jury investigations are not limited in scope to specific criminal acts, see, e.g., Wilson v. United States, 221 U.S. 361, Hendricks v. United States, 223 U.S. 178, 184, United States v. Johnson, 319 U.S. 503, and since standards of materiality and relevance are greatly relaxed. Holt v. United States, 218 U.S. 245; United States v. Costello, 350 U.S. 359. See generally Note, The Grand Jury as an Investigatory Body, 74 Harv. L. Rev. 590, 591–592 (1961).[31] For, as the United States notes in its brief in Caldwell, the grand jury "need establish no factual basis for commencing an investigation, and can pursue rumors which further investigation may prove groundless."

Accordingly, when a reporter is asked to appear before a grand jury and reveal confidences, I would hold that the government must (1) show that there is probable cause to believe that the newsman has information which is clearly relevant to a specific probable violation of law;[32] (2) demonstrate that the information sought cannot be obtained by alternative means less destructive of First Amendment rights; and (3) demonstrate a compelling and overriding interest in the information.[33]

This is not to say that a grand jury could not issue a subpoena until such a showing were made, and it is not to say that a newsman would be in any way privileged to ignore any subpoena that was issued. Obviously, before the government's burden to make such a showing were triggered, the reporter would have to move to quash the subpoena, asserting the basis on which he considered the particular relationship a confidential one.

B

The crux of the Court's rejection of any newsman's privilege is its observation that only "where news sources themselves are implicated in crime or possess information relevant to the grand jury's task need they or the reporter be concerned about grand jury subpoenas." See ante, at 25 (emphasis supplied). But this is a most misleading construct. For it is obviously not true that the only persons about whom reporters will be forced to testify will be those "confidential informants involved in actual criminal conduct" and those having "information suggesting illegal conduct by others." See ante, at 25, 27. As noted above, given the grand jury's extraordinarily broad investigative powers and the weak standards of relevance and materiality that apply during such inquiries, reporters, if they have no testimonial privilege, will be called to give information about informants who have neither committed crimes nor have information about crime. It is to avoid deterrence of such sources and thus to prevent needless injury to First Amendment values that I think the government must be required to show probable cause that the newsman has information which is clearly relevant to a specific probable violation of criminal law.[34]

---

[31] In addition, witnesses customarily are not allowed to object to questions on the grounds of materiality or relevance, since the scope of the grand jury inquiry is deemed to be of no concern to the witness. Blair v. United States, 417 F. 2d 384, cert. denied, 399 U.S. 935. Nor is counsel permitted to be present to aid a witness. See In re Groban, 352 U.S. 330.

See generally Younger, The Grand Jury Under Article III, 46 Crim. L.C. & P.S. 214 (1955); Note, 104 U. Pa. L. Rev. 429 (1955); Watts, Grand Jury: Sleeping Watchdog or Expensive Antique, 37 N.C. L. Rec. 290 (1959); Whyte, "Is the Grand Jury Necessary," 45 Va. L. Rev. 469 (1959); Note, 2 Col. L. and Soc. [32] The standard of proof employed by most grand juries, federal and State, is simply "probable cause" to believe that the accused has committed a crime. See Note, 1963 Wash. U. L. Q. 102; L. Hall et al., Modern Criminal Procedure 793–794 (1969). Generally speaking, it is extremely difficult to challenge indictments on the ground that they are not supported by adequate or competent evidence. Cf. Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359; Beck v. Washington, 369 U.S. 541.

[33] Cf. Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545. The Second Circuit Court of Appeals declined to provide a testimonial privilege to a newsman called to testify at a civil trial. But the court recognized a newsman's First Amendment right to a confidential relationship with his source and concluded: "It is to be noted that we are not dealing here with the use of judicial process to force a wholesale disclosure of a newspaper's confidential sources of news, nor with a case where the identity of the news source is of doubtful relevance or materiality. . . . The question asked went to the heart of the plaintiff's claim." Id., at 549–550 (citations omitted).

Similarly, a reporter may have information from a confidential source which is "related" to the commission of crime, but the government may be able to obtain an indictment or otherwise achieve its purposes by subpoenaing persons other than the reporter. It is an obvious but important truism that when government aims have been fully served, there can be no legitimate reason to disrupt a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source. To do so would not aid the administration of justice and would only impair the flow of information to the public. Thus, it is to avoid deterrence of such sources that I think the government must show that there are no alternative means for the grand jury to obtain the information sought.

Both the "probable cause" and "alternative means" requirements would thus serve the vital function of mediating between the public interest in the administration of justice and the constitutional protection of the full flow of information. These requirements would avoid a direct conflict between these competing concerns, and they would generally provide adequate protection for newsmen. See Part III, infra.[35] No doubt the courts would be required to make some delicate judgments in working out this accommodation. But that, after all, is the function of courts of law. Better such judgments, however difficult, than the simplistic and stultifying absolutism adopted by the Court in denying any force to the First Amendment in these cases.[36]

The error in the Court's absolute rejection of First Amendment interests in these cases seems to me to be most profound. For in the name of advancing the administration of justice, the Court's decision, I think, will only impair the achievement of that goal. People entrusted with law enforcement responsibility, no less than private citizens, need general information relating to controversial social problems. Obviously, press reports have great value to government, even when the newsman cannot be compelled to testify before a grand jury. The sad paradox of the Court's position is that when a grand jury may exercise an unbridled subpoena power, and sources involved in sensitive matters become fearful of disclosing information, the newsman will not only cease to be a useful grand jury witness; he will cease to investigate and publish information about issues of public import. I cannot subscribe to such an anomalous result, for, in my view, the interests protected by the First Amendment are not antagonistic to the administration of justice. Rather, they can, in the long run, only be complementary, and for that reason must be given great "breathing space." NAACP v. Button, 371 U. S. 415, 433.

[34] If this requirement is not met, then the government will basically be allowed to undertake a "fishing expedition" at the expense of the press. Such general, exploratory investigations will be most damaging to confidential news-gathering relationships, since they will create great uncertainty in both reporters and their sources. The Court sanctions such explorations, by refusing to apply a meaningful "probable cause" requirement. See ante, at 35–36. As the Court states, a grand jury investigation "may be triggered by tips, rumors, evidence proferred by the prosecutor, or the personal knowledge of the grand jurors." Ante, at 36. It thereby invites government to try to annex the press as an investigative arm, since any time government wants to probe the relationships between the newsman and his source, it can, on virtually any pretext, convene a grand jury and compel the journalist to testify.

The Court fails to recognize that under the guise of "investigating crime" vindictive prosecutors can, using the broad powers of the grand jury which are, in effect, immune from judicial supervision, explore the newsman's sources at will, with no serious law enforcement purpose. The secrecy of grand jury proceedings affords little consolation to a news source; the prosecutor obviously will, in most cases, have knowledge of testimony given by grand jury witnesses.

[35] We need not, therefore, reach the question of whether government's interest in these cases is "overriding and compelling." I do not, however, believe, as the Court does, that all grand jury investigations automatically would override the newsman's testimonial privilege.

[36] The disclaimers in Mr. Justice Powell's concurring opinion leave room for the hope that in some future case the Court may take a less absolute position in this area.

III

In deciding what protection should be given to information a reporter receives in confidence from a news source, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the holding of the District Court that the grand jury power of testimonial compulsion must not be exercised in a manner likely to impair First Amendment interests "until there has been a clear showing of compelling and overriding national interest that cannot be served by alternative means." Caldwell v. United States, 434 F. 2d 1081, 1086. It approved the request of respondent Caldwell for specification by the government of the "subject, direction or scope of the grand jury inquiry." Id., at 1085. And it held that in the circumstances of this case Caldwell need not divulge confidential information.

I think this decision was correct. On the record before us the Unted States has not met the burden which I think the appropriate newsman's privilege should require.

In affidavits before the District Court, the United States said it was investigating possible violations of 18 U.S.C. § 871 (threats against the President), 18 U.S.C. § 1751 (assassination, attempts to assassinate, conspiracy to assassinate the President), 18 U.S.C. § 231 (civil disorders), 18 U.S.C. § 1201 (interstate travel to incite a riot), 18 U.S.C. § 1341 (mail fraud and swindles) and other crimes which were not specified. But, with one exception, there has been no factual showing in this case of the probable commission of, or of attempts to commit, any crimes.[37] The single exception relates to the allegation that a Black Panther Party leader, David Hilliard, violated 18 U.S.C. § 871 during the course of a speech in November 1969. But Caldwell was subpoenaed two months after an indictment was returned against Hilliard, and that charge could not, subsequent to the indictment, be investigated by a grand jury. See In re National Window Glass Workers, 287 Fed. 219; United States v. Dardi, 330 F. 2d 316, 336.[38] Furthermore, the record before us does not show that Caldwell probably had any information about the violation of any other federal crimes,[39] or that alternative means of obtaining the desired information were pursued.[40]

In the Caldwell case, the Court of Appeals further found that Caldwell's confidential relationship with the leaders of the Black Panther Party would be impaired if he appeared before the grand jury at all to answer questions, even though not privileged. Caldwell v. United States, 434 F. 2d, at 1088. On the particular facts before it.[41] the Court concluded that the very appearance by [37] See Blasi, at 61 ff.

[38] After Caldwell was first subpoenaed to appear before the grand jury, the Government did undertake, by affidavits, to "set forth facts indicating the general nature of the grand jury's investigation [and] witness Earl Caldwell's possession of information relevant to this general inquiry." In detailing the basis for the belief that a crime had probably been committed, the government simply asserted that certain actions had previously been taken by other grand juries, and by Government counsel, with respect to certain members of the Black Panther Party (i.e., immunity grants for certain Black Panthers were sought; the Government moved to compel party members to testify before grand juries; and contempt citations were sought when party members refused to testify). No facts were asserted suggesting the actual commission of crime. The exception, as noted, involved David Hilliard's speech and its republication in the party newspaper, "The Black Panther," for which Hilliard had been indicted before Caldwell was subpoenaed.

[39] In its affidavits, the government placed primary reliance on certain articles published by Caldwell in the New York Times during 1969 (on June 15, July 20, July 22, July 27, and December 14). On December 14, 1969, Caldwell wrote:

"We are special, Mr. Hilliard said recently. We advocate the very direct overthrow of the Government by way of force and violence. By picking up guns and moving against it because we recognize it as being oppressive and in recognizing that we know that the only solution to it is armed struggle.

"In their role as the vanguard in a revolutionary struggle, the Panthers have picked up guns.

"Last week two of their leaders were killed during the police raid on one of their offices in Chicago. And in Los Angeles a few days earlier, three officers and three Panthers were wounded in a similar shooting incident. In these and in some other raids, the police have found caches of weapons, including high-powered rifles."

In my view, this should be read as indicating that Caldwell had interviewed Panther leaders. It does not indicate that he probably had knowledge of the crimes being investigated by the Government. And, to repeat, to the extent it does relate to Hilliard's threat, an indictment had already been brought on that matter. The other articles merely demonstrate that Black Panther Party leaders had told Caldwell their ideological beliefs—beliefs which were readily available to the Government through other sources, like the party newspaper.

[40] The Government did not attempt to show that means less impinging upon First Amendment interests had been pursued.

[41] In an affidavit filed with the District Court, Caldwell stated:

"I began covering and writing articles about the Black Panthers almost from the time of their inception, and I myself found that in those first months that they were very

Caldwell before the grand jury would jeopardize his relationship with his sources, leading to a severance of the news-gathering relationship and impairment of the flow of news to the public:[42]

> "Appellant asserted in affidavit that there is nothing to which he could testify (beyond that which he has already made public and for which, therefore, his appearance is unnecessary) that is not protected by the District Court's order. If this is true—and the Government apparently has not believed it necessary to dispute it—appellant's response to the subpoena would be a barren performance—one of no benefit to the Grand Jury. To destroy appellant's capacity as news gatherer for such a return hardly makes sense. Since the cost to the public of excusing his attendance is so slight, it may be said that there is here no public interest of real substance in competition with the First Amendment freedoms that are jeopardized.
> "If any competing public interest is ever to arise in a case such as this (where First Amendment liberties are threatened by mere appearance at a Grand Jury investigation) it will be on an occasion in which the witness, armed with his privilege, can still serve a useful purpose before the Grand Jury. Considering the scope of the privilege embodied in the protective order, these occasions would seem to be unusual. It is not asking too much of the Government to show that such an occasion is presented here." Caldwell, supra, at 1089.

I think this ruling was also correct in light of the particularized circumstances of the Caldwell case. Obviously, only in very rare circumstances would a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source be so sensitive that mere appearance before the grand jury by the newsman would substantially impair his newsgathering function. But in this case, the reporter made out a prima facie case that the flow of news to the public would be curtailed. And he stated, without contradiction, that the only nonconfidential material about which he could testify was already printed in his newspaper articles.[43] Since the United States has not attempted to refute this assertion, the appearance of Caldwell would on these facts, indeed be a "barren performance." But this aspect of the Caldwell judgment I would confine to its own facts. As the Court of Appeals brief and reluctant to discuss any substantive matter with me. However, as they realized I could be trusted and that my sole purpose was to collect my information and present it objectively in the newspaper and that I had no other motive, I found that not only were the party leaders available for in-depth interviews but also the rank and file members were cooperative in aiding me in the newspaper stories that I wanted to do. During the time that I have been covering the party, I have noticed other newspapermen representing legitimate organizations in the news media turned away because they were not known and trusted by the party leadership.

"As a result of the relationship that I have developed, I have been able to write lengthy stories about the Panthers that have appeared in The New York Times and have been of such a nature that other reporters who have not known the Panthers have not been able to write. Many of these stories have appeared in up to 50 or 60 other newspapers around the country.

"The Black Panther Party's method of operation with regard to members of the press is significantly different from that of other organizations. For instance, press credentials are not recognized as being of any significance. In addition, interviews are not normally designated as being 'backgrounders' or 'off the record' or 'for publication' or 'on the record.' Because no substantive interviews are given until a relationship of trust and confidence is developed between the Black Panther Party members and a reporter, statements are rarely made to such reporters on an expressed 'on' and 'off' the record basis. Instead, an understanding is developed over a period of time between the Black Panther Party members and the reporter as to matters which the Black Panther Party wishes to disclose for publications and those matters which are given in confidence. . . . Indeed, if I am forced to appear in secret grand jury proceedings, my appearance alone would be interpreted by the Black Panthers and other dissident groups as a possible disclosure of confidences and trusts and would similarly destroy my effectiveness as a newspaperman."

[42] "Militant groups might very understandably fear that, under the pressure of examination before a Grand Jury, the witness may fail to protect their confidences. . . . The Government characterizes this anticipated loss of communication as Black Panther reprisal. . . . But it is not an extortionate threat that we face. It is a human reaction as reasonable to expect as that a client will leave a lawyer when his confidence is shaken. . . . As the Government points out, loss of such a sensitive news source can also result from its reaction to indiscreet or unfavorable reporting or from a reporter's association with Government agents or persons disapproved of by the news source. Loss in such a case, however, results from an exercise of the choice and prerogative of a free press. It is not the result of Government compulsion." Caldwell v. United States, 434 F. 2d 1088.

[43] Caldwell stated in his affidavit filed with the District Court, see n. 40, supra:

"It would be virtually impossible for me to recall whether any particular matter disclosed to me by members of the Black Panther Party since January 1, 1969, was based on an understanding that it would or would not be confidential. Generally, those matters which were made on a nonconfidential or 'for publication' basis have been published in articles I have written in The New York Times; conversely, any matters which I have not thus far disclosed in published articles would have been given to me based on the understanding that they were confidential and would not be published."

appropriately observed: "The rule of this case is a narrow one. . . ." Caldwell, supra, at 1090.

Accordingly, I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals in No. 70-57, United States v. Caldwell.[44] In the other two cases before us, No. 70-85, Branzburg v. Hayes and Branzburg v. Meigs, and No. 70-94, In the Matter of Paul Pappas, I would vacate the judgments and remand the cases for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views I have expressed in this opinion.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 70-57

UNITED STATES, PETITIONER, v. EARL CALDWELL

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit

[June 29, 1972]

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, dissenting.

Caldwell, a Black, is a reporter for the New York Times and was assigned to San Francisco with the hope that he could report on the activities and attitudes of the Black Panther Party. Caldwell in time gained the complete confidence of its members and wrote in-depth articles about them.

He was subpoenaed to appear and testify before a federal grand jury and to bring with him notes and tapes covering interviews with its members. A hearing on a motion to quash was held. The District Court ruled that while Caldwell must appear before the grand jury, he need not reveal confidential communications unless the court was satisfied that there was a "compelling and overriding national interest." See 311 F. Supp. 358. Caldwell filed a notice of appeal and the Court of Appeals dismissed the appeal without opinion.

Shortly thereafter a new grand jury was impanelled and it issued a new subpoena for Caldwell to testify. On a motion to quash, the District Court issued an order substantially identical to its earlier one.

Caldwell refused to appear and was held in contempt. On appeal the Court of Appeals vacated the judgment of contempt. It said that the revealing of confidential sources of information jeopardized a First Amendment freedom, that Caldwell need not appear before the grand jury absent a showing that there was a "compelling or overriding national interest" in pursuing such an interrogation.

The District Court had found that Caldwell's knowledge of the activities of the Black Panthers "derived in substantial part" from information obtained "within the scope of a relationship of trust and confidence." It also found that confidential relationships of this sort are commonly developed and maintained by professional journalists, and are indispensable to their work of gathering, analyzing, and publishing the news.

The District Court further had found that compelled disclosure of information received by a journalist within the scope of such confidential relationships jeopardized those relationships and thereby impaired the journalist's ability to gather, analyze, and publish the news.

The District Court finally had found that, without a protective order delimiting the scope of interrogation of Earl Caldwell by the grand jury, his appearance and examination before the jury would severely impair and damage his confidential relationships with members of the Black Panther Party and other militants, and thereby severely impair and damage his ability to gather, analyze, and publish news concerning them; and that it would also damage and impair the abilities of all reporters to gather, analyze, and publish news concerning them.

The Court of Appeals agreed with the findings of the District Court but held that Caldwell need not appear at all before the grand jury absent a "compelling need" shown by the Government. 434 F. 2d 1081.

It is my view that there is no "compelling need" that can be shown which qualifies the reporter's immunity from appearing or testifying before a grand jury, unless the reporter himself is implicated in a crime. His immunity in my view is therefore quite complete, for absent his involvement in a crime, the First Amendment protects him against an appearance before a grand jury and if he is involved in a crime, the Fifth Amendment stands as a barrier. Since in my view there is no area of inquiry not protected by a privilege, the reporter need not appear for the futile purpose of invoking one to each question. And, since in my view a newsman has an absolute right not to appear before a grand jury it follows for me that a journalist who voluntarily appears before that body may invoke his First Amendment privilege to specific questions. The basic issue is the extent to which the First Amendment (which is applicable to investigating committees, Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178; NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 463; Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigating Committee, 372 U.S. 539; Baird v. State Bar, 401 U.S. 1, 6–7; I re Stolar, 401 U.S. 23) must yield to the Government's asserted need to know a reporter's unprinted information.

[44] The District Court reserved jurisdiction to modify its order on a showing of a governmental interest which cannot be served by means other than Caldwell's grand jury testimony. The Government would thus have further opportunity in that court to meet the burden which, I think, protection of First Amendment rights requires.

The starting point for decision pretty well marks the range within which the end result lies. The New York Times, whose reporting functions are at issue here, takes the amazing position that First Amendment rights are to be balanced against other needs or conveniences of government.[1] My belief is that all of the "balancing" was done by those who wrote the Bill of Rights. By casting the First Amendment in absolute terms, they repudiated, the timid, watered-down, emasculated versions of the First Amendment which both the Government and the New York Times advances in the case.

My view is close to that of the late Alexander Meiklejohn:[2]

> "For the understanding of these principles it is essential to keep clear the crucial difference between 'the rights' of the governed and 'the powers' of the governors. And at this point, the title 'Bill of Rights' is lamentably inaccurate as a designation of the first ten amendments. They are not a 'Bill of Rights' but a 'Bill of Powers and Rights.' The Second through the Ninth Amendments limit the powers of the subordinate agencies in order that due regard shall be paid to the private 'rights of the governed. The First and Tenth Amendments protect the governing 'powers' of the people from abridgment by the agencies which are established as their servants. In the field of our 'rights,' each one of us can claim 'due process of law.' In the field of our governing 'powers,' the notion of 'due process is irrelevant."

He also believed that "Self-government can exist only insofar as the voters acquire the intelligence, integrity, sensitivity, and generous devotion to the general welfare that, in theory, casting a ballot is assumed to express,"[3] and that "[p]ublic discussions of public issues, together with the spreading of information and opinion bearing on those issues, must have a freedom unabridged by our agents. Though they govern us, we, in a deeper sense, govern them. Over our governing, they have no power. Over their governing we have sovereign power."[4]

Two principles which follow from this understanding of the First Amendment are at stake here. One is that the people, the ultimate governors, must have absolute freedom of and therefore privacy of their individual opinions and beliefs regardless of how suspect or strange they may appear to others. Ancillary to that principle is the conclusion that an individual must also have absolute privacy over whatever information he may generate in the course of testing his opinions and beliefs. In this regard, Caldwell's status as a reporter is less relevant than is his status as a student who affirmatively pursued empirical research to enlarge his own intellectual viewpoint. The second principle is that effective self-government cannot succeed unless the people are immersed in a steady, robust, unimpeded, and uncensored flow of opinion and reporting which are continuously subjected to critique, rebuttal, and re-examination. In this respect, Caldwell's status as a newsgatherer and an integral part of that process becomes critical.

[1] "The three minimal tests we contend must be met before testimony divulging confidences may be compelled from a reporter are these: 1. The government must clearly show that there is probable cause to believe that the reporter possesses information which is specifically relevant to a specific probable violation of law. 2. The government must clearly show that the information it seeks cannot be obtained by alternative means, which is to say, from sources other than the reporter. 3. The government must clearly demonstrate a compelling and overriding interest in the information." Amicus Brief, N.Y. Times, at 29.

Government has many interests that compete with the First Amendment. Congressional investigations to determine how existing laws actually operate or whether new laws are needed. While congressional committees have broad powers, they are subject to the restraints of the First Amendment. As we said in Watkins v. United States, 354 U. S. 178, 197: "Clearly, an investigation is subject to the command that the Congress shall make no law abridging freedom of speech or press or assembly. While it is true that there is no statute to be reviewed, and that an investigation is not a law, nevertheless an investigation is part of lawmaking. It is justified solely as an adjunct to the legislative process. The First Amendment may be invoked against infringement of the protected freedoms by law or by lawmaking."

Hence matters of belief, ideology, religious practices, social philosophy and the like are beyond the pale and of no rightful concern of government, unless the belief or the speech or other expression has been translated into action. West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U. S. 624, 642; Baird v. State Bar, 401 U. S. 1, 6–7; In re Stolar, 401 U. S. 23.

Also at stake here is Caldwell's privacy of association. We have held that "[i]nviolability of privacy in group association may in many circumstances be indispensable to preservation of freedom of association, particularly where a group espouses dissident beliefs." NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449, 462; NAACP v. Button, 371 U. S. 415.

As I said in Gibson v. Florida Legislative Committee, 372 U.S. 539, 565: ". . . the associational rights protected by the First Amendment . . . cover the entire spectrum in political ideology as well as in art, in journalism, in teaching, and in religion. [G]overnment is . . . precluded from probing the intimacies of spiritual and intellectual relationships in the myriad of such societies and groups that exist in this country, regardless of the legislative purpose to be served . . . . If that is not true, I see no barrier to investigation of newspapers, churches, political parties, clubs, societies, unions, and any other associations for their political, economic, social, philosophical, or religious vews." (Emphasis added.)

The Court has not always been consistent in its protection of these First Amendment rights and has sometimes allowed a government interest to override the absolutes of the First Amendment. For example, under the banner of the "clear and present danger" test,[5] and later under the influence of the "balancing" formula,[6] the Court has permitted men to be penalized not for any harmful conduct but solely for holding unpopular beliefs.

In recent years we have said over and again that where First Amendment rights are concerned any regulation "narrowly drawn,"[7] must be "compelling" and not merely "rational" as is the case where other activities are concerned.[8] But the "compelling" interest in regulation neither includes paring down or diluting the right, nor embraces penalizing one solely for his intellectual viewpoint; it concerns the State's interest, for example, in regulating the time and place or perhaps manner of exercising First Amendment rights. Thus one has an undoubted right to read and proclaim the First Amendment in the classroom or in a park. But he would not have the right to blare it forth from a sound truck rolling through the village at 2 a.m. The distinction drawn in Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303–304, should still stand: "[T]he Amendment embraces two concepts—freedom to believe and freedom to act. The first is absolute but, in the nature of things, the second cannot be."[9]

[5] E.g., Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (wartime antidraft leafleting); Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (wartime anti-draft speech); Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (wartime leafleting calling for general strike); Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (arrest of radical speaker without attempt to protect him from hostile audience); Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (reformulation of test as "not improbable" rule to sustain conviction of knowing advocacy of overthrow); Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (knowing membership in group which espouses forbidden advocacy is punishable). For a more detailed account of the infamy of the "clear and present danger" test see my concurring opinion in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447.

[6] E.g., Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 485 (protection of schools from "pollution" outweighs public teachers' freedom to advocate violent overthrow); Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72, 79, 81 (preserving security of New Hampshire from subversives outweighs privacy of list of participants in suspect summer camp); Barenblatt v. United States, [illegible] U.S. 109 (legislative inquiry more important that protecting HUACS witness' refusal to answer whether a third person had been a communist); Wilkinson v. United States, [illegible] U.S. 399 (legislative inquiry more important than protecting HUAC witness' refusal to state whether he was currently a member of the Communist Party); Braden v. United States, 365 U.S. 431, 435 (legislative inquiry more important than protecting HUAC witness' refusal to state whether he had once been a member of the Communist Party); Konigsberg v. State Bar, 366 U.S. 36 (regulating membership of bar outweighs interest of applicants in refusing to answer question concerning communist affiliations); In re Anastaplo, 366 U.S. 82 (regulating membership of bar outweighs protection of applicant's belief in Declaration of Independence that citizens should revolt against an oppressive government); Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 367 U.S. 1 (national security outweighs privacy of association of leaders of suspect groups); Law Students Research Council v. Wadmond, 401 U.S. 154 (regulating membership of bar outweighs privacy of applicants' views on the soundness of the Constitution).

[7] Thus, we have held "overbroad" measures which unduly restricted the time, place, and manner of expression. Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 161 (anti-leafleting law); Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 102 (anti-boycott statute); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (breach of peace measure); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (breach of peace measure); Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (breach of peace statute); Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 22 (breach of peace statute); Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. —— (breach of

Under these precedents there is no doubt that Caldwell could not be brought before the grand jury for the sole purpose of exposing his political beliefs. Yet today the Court effectively permits that result under the guise of allowing an attempt to elicit from him "factual information." To be sure, the inquiry will be couched only in terms of extracting Caldwell's recollection of what was said to him during the interviews, but the fact remains that his questions to the Panthers and therefore the respective answers were guided by Caldwell's own preconceptions and views about the Black Panthers. His entire experience was shaped by his intellectual viewpoint. Unlike the random bystander, those who affirmatively set out to test an hypothesis, as here, have no tidy means of segregating subjective opinion from objective facts.

Sooner or later any test which provides less than blanket protection to beliefs and associations will be twisted and relaxed so as to provide virtually no protection at all. As Justice Holmes noted in Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616, such was the fate of the "clear and present danger" test which he had coined in Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47. Eventually, that formula was so watered down that the danger had to be neither clear nor present but merely "not improbable." Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 510. See my concurring opinion in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447. A compelling peace statute). But insofar as penalizing the content of thought and opinion is concerned, the Court has not in recent Terms permitted any interest to override the absolute privacy of one's philosophy. To be sure, opinions have often adverted to the absence of a compelling justification for attempted intrusions into philosophical or associational privacy. E.g., Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 523 (disclosure of NAACP membership lists to city officials); Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigating Committee, 372 U.S. 539, 546 (disclosure of NAACP membership list to state legislature); DeGregory v. Attorney General of New Hampshire, 383 U.S. 825, 829 (witness' refusal to state whether he had been a member of the Communist Party three years earlier); Baird v. State Bar of Arizona, 401 U.S. 1, 6–7 (refusal of bar applicant to state whether she had been a member of the Communist Party), In re Stolar, 401 U.S. 23 (refusal of bar applicant to state whether he was "loyal" to the government); see also Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576 (expression of digust for flag). Yet, while the rhetoric of these opinions did not expressly embrace an absolute privilege for the privacy of opinions and philosophy, the trend of those results was not inconsistent with and in their totality appeared to be approaching such a doctrine. Moreover, in another group of opinions invalidating for overbreadth intrusions into the realm of belief and association, there was no specification of whether a danger test, a balancing process, an absolute doctrine, or a compelling justification inquiry had been used to detect invalid applications comprehended by the challenged measures. E.g., Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U.S. 183 (loyalty test which condemned mere unknowing membership in a suspect group); Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (requirement that public teachers disclose all affiliations); Gremillion v. NAACP, 366 U.S. 293, 296 (disclosure of NAACP membership lists); Whitehall v. Elkins, 389 U.S. 54, 59 (nonactive membership in a suspect group a predicate for refusing employment as a public teacher); United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258 (mere membership in Communist Party a sole ground for exclusion from employment in defense facility). Regrettably, the vitality of the overdue trend toward a complete privilege in this area has been drawn into question by quite recent decisions of the Court, Law Students Research Council v. Wadmond, 401 U.S. 154, holding that bar applicants may be turned away for refusing to disclose their opinions on the soundness of the Constitution; Cole v. Richardson, 405 U.S. ——, sustaining an oath required of public employees that they will "oppose" a violent overthrow; and, of course, by today's decision.

[8] Where no more than economic interests were affected this Court has upheld legislation only upon a showing that it was "rationally connected" to some permissible state objective, only upon a showing that it was "rationally connected" to some permissible state objective. E.g., United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 152; Goesaert v. Cleary, 335 U.S. 464; Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. 483; McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420; McDonald v. Board of Election Comm'rs., 394 U.S. 802; United States v. Maryland Savings-Share Ins. Corp., 400 U.S. 4; Richardson v. Belcher, 404 U.S. 78; Schilb v. Keubel, 404 U.S. 357.

[9] The majority cites several cases which held that certain burdens on the press were permissible despite incidental burdens on its newsgathering ability. For example, see Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333, 358. Even assuming that those cases were rigidly decided, the fact remains that in none of them was the Government attempting to extract personal belief from a witness and the privacy of a citizen's personal intellectual viewpoint was not implicated.

interest test may prove as pliable as did the clear and present danger test. Perceptions of the worth of state objectives will change with the composition of the Court and with the intensity of the politics of the times. For example, in Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72, sustaining an attempt to compel a witness to divulge the names of participants in a summer political camp, JUSTICE BRENNAN dissented on the ground that "it is patent that there is really no subordinating interest . . . demonstrated on the part of the State." Id., 106. The majority, however, found that "the governmental interest in self-preservation is sufficiently compelling to subordinate the interest in associational privacy . . . ." Id., 81. That is to enter the world of "make believe," for New Hampshire, the State involved in Uphaus, was never in fear of being overthrown.

II

Today's decision will impede the wide open and robust dissemination of ideas and counterthought which a free press both fosters and protects and which is essential to the success of intelligent self-government. Forcing a reporter before a grand jury will have two retarding effects upon the ear and the pen of the press. Fear of exposure will cause dissidents to communicate less openly to trusted reporters. And, fear of accountability will cause editors and critics to write with more restrained pens.

I see no way of making mandatory the disclosure of a reporter's confidential source of the information on which he bases his news story.

The press has a preferred position in our constitutional scheme not to enable it to make money, not to set newsmen apart as a favored class, but to bring fulfillment to the public's right to know. The right to know is crucial to the governing powers of the people, to paraphrase Alexander Meiklejohn. Knowledge is essential to informed decisions.

As Mr. Justice Black said in New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, 717 (concurring opinion), "The press was to serve the governed, not the governors. . . . The press was protected so that it could bare the secrets of government and inform the people."

Government has an interest in law and order; and history shows that the trend of rulers—the bureaucracy and the police—is to suppress the radical and his ideas and to arrest him rather than the hostile audience. See Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315. Yet as held in Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1, 4, one "function of free speech under our system of government is to invite dispute." We went on to say, "It may indeed best serve its high purpose when it induces a condition of unrest, creates dissatisfaction with conditions as they are, or even stirs people to anger. Speech is often provocative and challenging. It may strike at prejudices and preconceptions and have profound unsettling effects as it presses for acceptance of an idea."

The people who govern are often far removed from the cabals that threaten the regime; the people are often remote from the sources of truth even though they live in the city where the forces that would undermine society operate. The function of the press is to explore and investigate events, inform the people what is going on, and to expose the harmful as well as the good influences at work. There is no higher function performed under our constitutional regime. Its performance means that the press is often engaged in projects that bring anxiety or even fear to the bureaucracies or departments or officials of government. The whole weight of government is therefore often brought to bear against a paper or a reporter.

A reporter is no better than his source of information. Unless he has a privilege to withhold the identity of his source, he will be the victim of governmental intrigue or aggression. If he can be summoned to testify in secret before a grand jury, his sources will dry up and the attempted exposure, the effort to enlighten the public, will be ended. If what the Court sanctions today becomes settled law, then the reporter's main function in American society will be to pass on to the public the press releases which the various departments of government issue.

It is no answer to reply that the risk that a newsman will divulge one's secrets to the grand jury is no greater than the threat that he will in any event inform to the police. Even the most trustworthy reporter may not be able to withstand relentless badgering before a grand jury.[10]

The record in this case is replete with weighty affidavits from responsible newsmen, telling how important are the sanctity of their sources of information.[11] When we deny newsmen that protection, we deprive the people of the information needed to run the affairs of the Nation in an intelligent way.

Madison said:

> "A popular Government, without popular information, or the means of acquiring it, is but a Prologue to a Farce or a Tragedy; or, perhaps both. Knowledge will forever govern ignorance; And, a people who mean to be their own Governors, must arm themselves with the power which knowledge gives (to W. T. Barry, August 4, 1822)." The Complete Madison 337 (1953).

Today's decision is more than a clog upon news gathering. It is a signal to publishers and editors that they should exercise caution in how they use whatever information they can obtain. Without immunity they may be summoned to account for their criticism. Entrenched officers have been quick to crash their powers down upon unfriendly commentators.[12] E.g., New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254; Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64; Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563; Gravel v. United States, ante.

The intrusion of government into this domain is symptomatic of the disease of this society. As the years pass the power of government becomes more and more pervasive. It is a power to suffocate both people and causes. Those in power, whatever their politics, want only to perpetuate it. Now that the fences of the law and the tradition that has protected the press are broken down, the people are the victims. The First Amendment, as I read it, was designed precisely to prevent that tragedy.

[10] "The secrecy of the [grand jury's] proceedings and the possibility of a jail sentence for contempt so intimidate the witness that he may be led into answering questions which pry into his personal life and associations and which, in the bargain, are frequently immaterial and vague. Alone and faced by either hostile or apathetic grand juries, the witness is frequently undone by his experience. Life in a relatively open society makes him especially vulnerable to a secret appearance before a body that is considering criminal charges. And the very body toward which he could once look for protection has become a weapon of the prosecution. When he seeks protective guidance from his lawyer, he learns that the judicial broadening of the due process which has occurred in the past two decades has largely ignored grand jury matters, precisely because it was assumed that the grand jury still functioned as a guardian of the rights of potential defendants." Donnor & Cerruti, The Grand Jury Network: How the Nixon Administration Has Secretly Perverted A Traditional Safeguard of Individual Rights, 214 The Nation 5, 6 (1972).

[11] It is said that "we remain unclear how often and to what extent informers are actually deterred from furnishing information when newsmen are forced to testify before a grand jury." But the majority need look no further than its holdings that prosecutors need not disclose informers' names because disclosure would (a) terminate the usefulness of an exposed informant inasmuch as others would no longer confide in him, and (b) it would generally inhibit persons from becoming confidential informers. McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300; Scher v. United States, 305 U.S. 251; cf. Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53.

We have not outlived the tendency of officials' to retaliate against critics. For recent examples see J. Wiggins, Freedom or Secrecy 87 (1956) ("New Mexico, in 1954, furnished a striking example of government reprisal against . . . a teacher in the state reform school [who] wrote a letter to the New Mexican, confirming stories it had printed about mistreatment of inmates by guards. . . . UNITED STATES, PETITIONER, v. EARL CALDWELL

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit

[June 29, 1972]

MR. JUSTICE POWELL, concurring in the opinion of the Court.

I add this brief statement to emphasize what seems to me to be the limited nature of the Court's holding. The Court does not hold that newsmen, subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury, are without constitutional rights with respect to the gathering of news or in safeguarding their sources. Certainly, we do not hold, as suggested in the dissenting opinion, that state and federal authorities are free to "annex" the news media as "an investigative arm of government." The solicitude repeatedly shown by this Court for First Amendment freedoms should be sufficient assurance against any such effort, even if one seriously believed that the media—properly free and untrammeled in the fullest sense of these terms—were not able to protect themselves.

As indicated in the concluding portion of the opinion, the Court states that no harassment of newsmen will be tolerated. If a newsman believes that the grand jury investigation is not being conducted in good faith he is not without remedy. Indeed, if the newsman is called upon to give information bearing only a remote and tenuous relationship to the subject of the investigation, or if he has some other reason to believe that his testimony implicates confidential source relationships without a legitimate need of law enforcement, he will have access to the Court on a motion to quash and an appropriate protective order may be entered. The asserted claim of privilege should be judged on its facts by the striking of a proper balance between freedom of the press and the obligation of all citizens to give relevant testimony with respect to criminal conduct. The balance of these vital constitutional and societal interests on a case-by-case basis accords with the tried and traditional way of adjudicating such questions.*

In short, the courts will be available to newsmen under circumstances where legitimate First Amendment interests require protection.

*It is to be remembered that Caldwell asserts a constitutional privilege not even to appear before the grand jury unless a court decides that the government has made a showing that meets the three preconditions specified in the dissenting opinion of MR. JUSTICE STEWART. To be sure, this would require a "balancing" of interests by the Court, but under circumstances and constraints significantly different from the balancing that will be appropriate under the Court's decision. The newsman witness, like all other witnesses, will have to appear; he will not be in a position to litigate at the threshold the State's very authority to subpoena him. Moreover, absent the constitutional preconditions that Caldwell and the dissenting opinion would impose as heavy burdens of proof to be carried by the State, the court—when called upon to protect a newsman from improper or prejudicial questioning—would be free to balance the competing interests on their merits in the particular case. The new constitutional rule endorsed by the dissenting opinion would, as a practical matter, defeat such a fair balancing and the essential societal interest in the detection and prosecution of crime would be heavily subordinated.

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

IN THE MATTER OF THE APPLICATION OF EARL CALDWELL AND NEW YORK TIMES COMPANY FOR AN ORDER QUASHING GRAND JURY SUBPOENAS, EARL CALDWELL, APPELLANT

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, APPELLEE

(No. 26,025)

[November 16, 1970]

On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of California

Before: MERRILL and ELY, Circuit Judges, and JAMESON, District Judge[*]

MERRILL, Circuit Judge:

Earl Caldwell appeals from an order holding him in contempt of court for disregard of an order directing him to appear before the Grand Jury of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California pursuant to a subpoena issued by the Grand Jury.

Appellant is a black news reporter for the New York Times. He has become a specialist in the reporting of news concerning the Black Panther Party. The Grand Jury is engaged in a general investigation of the Black Panthers and the possibility that they are engaged in criminal activities contrary to federal law.

In order to protect First Amendment interests asserted by appellant, the District Court order of attendance, which appellant disregarded, expressly granted appellant the privilege of silence as to certain matters until such time as the Government should demonstrate "a compelling and over-riding national interest in requiring Mr. Caldwell's testimony which cannot be served by any alternative means." This protective order provided:

> "(1) That * * * he shall not be required to reveal confidential associations, sources or information received, developed or maintained by him as a professional journalist in the course of his efforts to gather news for dissemination, to the public through the press or other news media.
> "(2) That specifically, without limiting paragraph (1), Mr. Caldwell shall not be required to answer questions concerning statements made to him or information given to him by members of the Black Panther Party unless such statements or information were given him for publication or public disclosure.
> "(3) That, to assure the effectuation of this order, Mr. Caldwell shall be permitted to consult with his counsel at any time he wishes during the course of his appearance before the grand jury * * *."

Appellant contends that the privilege granted by the District Court will not suffice to protect the First Amendment interests at stake; that unless a specific need for his testimony can be shown by the United States he should be excused from attendance before the Grand Jury altogether. Thus it is not the scope of the interrogation to which he must submit that is here at issue; it is whether he need attend at all.

The case is one of first impression and one in which news media have shown great interest and have accordingly favored us with briefs as amici curiae. As is true with many problems recently confronted by the courts, the case presents vital questions of public policy; questions as to how competing public interests shall be balanced. The issues require us to turn out attention to the underlying conflict between public interests and the nature of such competing interests.[1]

[*] Honorable William J. Jameson, United States District Judge for the District of Montana, sitting by designation.

[1] Where, as here, the alleged abridgement of First Amendment interests occurs as a by-product of otherwise permissible governmental action not directed at the regulation of speech or press, "resolution of the issue always involves a balancing by the courts of the competing private and public interests at stake in the particular circumstances shown." Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 126 (1959); see, e.g., Konisberg v. State Bar, 366 U.S. 36, 50–51 (1961); Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516 (1960); NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 460–67 (1958); Kalven, "The New York Times Case: A Note on 'The Central Meaning of the First Amendment,' " 1964, Sup.Ct.Rev. 191, 214–16 (1964).

While the United States has not appealed from the grant of privilege by the District Court (which it opposed below) and the propriety of that grant is thus not directly involved here, appellant's contentions here rest upon the same First Amendment foundation as did the protective order granted below. Thus, before we can decide whether the First Amendment requires more than a protective order delimiting the scope of interrogation, we must first decide whether it requires any privilege at all.

THE PROTECTIVE ORDER

The proceeding below were initiated by a motion by appellant to quash subpoenas issued by the Grand Jury.[2] In his moving papers appellant's position was that the "inevitable effect of the subpoenas will be to suppress vital First Amendment freedoms of Mr. Caldwell, of the New York Times, of the news media, and of militant political groups by driving a wedge of distrust and silence between the news media and the militants, and that this Court should not countenance a use of its process entailing so drastic an incursion upon First Amendment freedoms in the absence of compelling governmental interest—not shown here—in requiring Mr. Caldwell's appearance before the Grand Jury."

Amici curiae solidly supported appellant in this position. The fact that the subpoenas would have a "chilling effect" on First Amendment freedoms was impressively asserted in affidavits of newsmen of recognized stature, to a considerable extent based upon recited experience. Appellant's own history is related in his moving papers:

> "Earl Caldwell has been covering the Panthers almost since the Party's beginnings. Initially received hesitatingly and with caution, he has gradually won the confidence and trust of Party leaders and rank-and-file members. As a result, Panthers will now discuss Party views and activities freely with Mr. Caldwell. * * * Their confidences have enabled him to write informed and balanced stories concerning the Black Panther Party which are unavailable to most other newsmen.
> If Mr. Caldwell were to disclose Black Panther confidences to governmental officials, the grand jury, or any other person, he would thereby destroy the relationship of trust which he presently enjoys with the Panthers and other militant groups. They would refuse to speak to him; they would become even more reluctant than they are now to speak to any newsmen; and the news media would thereby be vitally hampered in their ability to cover the views and activities of the militants."

The response of the United States disputed the contention that First Amendment freedoms were endangered.

> "Newsmen filing affidavits herein allege that they fear, in effect, that the Black Panthers will refrain from furnishing them with news. This contention is specious. Despite some assertions by Black Panther leaders to the contrary, the Black Panthers in fact depend on the mass media for their constant endeavor to maintain themselves in the public eye and thus gain adherents and continued support. They have continued unceasingly to exploit the facilities of the mass media for their own purposes."

Assuming, arguendo, that this statement is correct, it is not fully responsive to the claim that First Amendment freedoms are endangered. The premise underlying the Government's statement is that First Amendment interests in this area are adequately safeguarded as long as potential news makers do not cease using the media as vehicles for their communication with the public. But the First Amendment means more than that. It exists to preserve an "untrammeled press as a vital source of public information," Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936). Its objective is the maximization of the "spectrum of available knowledge," Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 482 (1965). Thus, it is not enough that Black Panther press releases and public addresses by Panther leaders may continue unabated in the wake of subpoenas such as the one here in question. It is not enough that the public's knowledge of groups such as the Black Panthers should be confined to their deliberate public pronouncements or distant news accounts of their occasional dramatic forays into the public view.

[2] The first subpoena was served February 2, 1970. It directed appellant to appear and testify and to bring with him notes and tape recordings of interviews reflecting statements made for publication by officers and spokesmen for the Black Panther Party concerning the aims, purposes and activities of the organization. On March 16, after appellant had protested the scope of the subpoena, a second subpoena was served. It simply required appellant's attendance. Appellant's motion to quash was directed to both subpoenas. The court denied the motion and directed compliance with the March 16 subpoena subject to the protective order. Appellant appealed that decision; but the appeal was dismissed, apparently on the ground that the District Court order was not appealable. By then the term of the Grand Jury had expired, and a new Jury was sworn. A new subpoena ad testificandum was served on May 22, 1970. All proceedings had in connection with the earlier subpoenas were made a part of the record of the proceedings concerning this last subpoena. A new order directing attendance was issued; this order also contained the protective provisions or privilege. It is appellant's disregard of that order which resulted in the judgment of contempt now before us.

The need for an untrammeled press takes on special urgency in times of widespread protest and dissent. In such times the First Amendment protections exist to maintain communication with dissenting groups and to provide the public with a wide range of information about the nature of protest and heterodoxy. See, e.g., Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945); Thornhill v. Alabama. 310 U.S. 88, 102 (1940).

The affidavits contained in this record required the conclusion of the District Court that "compelled disclosure of information received by a journalist within the scope of such confidential relationships jeopardizes those relationships and thereby impairs the journalist's ability to gather, analyse, and publish the news."

Accordingly we agree with the District Court that First Amendment freedoms are here in jeopardy.

On the other side of the balance is the scope of the Grand Jury's investigative power.

In his moving papers appellant complained that the Government had not disclosed the subject, direction or scope of the Grand Jury inquiry and that efforts of counsel to obtain some specification had been unavailing.

> "Government counsel has said only that the grand jury has 'broad investigative powers,' that he cannot 'limit the inquiry of the grand jury in advance,' and that the subject and scope of the grand jury's investigation is 'no concern of a subpoenaed witness,' "

The Government in opposing appellant's motion to quash, stated position in these terms:

> "On the basis of what he has written, directly quoting statements made to him for publication by spokesmen for the Black Panther Party, Earl Caldwell obviously can give and should come forward with evidence which will be helpful to the Grand Jury in its inquiry."

Thus, as is true in innumerable instances, the Grand Jury does not know what it wants from this witness. It wants to find out what he knows that might shed light on the general problem it is investigating. This type of wideranging, open-ended inquiry is, of course, typical of many Grand Jury proceedings. See Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 26 S.Ct. 370, 50 L.Ed. 652 (1906); Note, "The Grand Jury as an Investigatory Body," 74 Har.L.Rev. 590, 591–92 (1961). If the privilege of silence as defined by the District Court is made available to news gatherers, the Grand Jury will be deprived of their assistance as witnesses in such general investigations.

The question posed below was whether, as a matter of law, this loss to the Grand Jury, this impediment to its traditionally broad scope of inquiry, outweighs the injury to First Amendment freedoms.

The Government stresses the historic traditions of the Grand Jury with its extensive powers of investigation, see, e.g., Hale v. Henkel, supra, and the corresponding duty of the citizenry to come before the Grand Jury to give testimony. United States v. Bryan, 339 U.S. 323, 70 S.Ct. 724, 94 L.Ed. 884 (1950); Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 39 S.Ct. 468, 63 L.Ed. 979 (1919). But these general propositions of Government authority necessarily are tempered by constitutional prohibitions and other exceptional circumstances. See United States v. Bryan, supra, 339 U.S. at 331, 70 S.Ct. 724, 94 L.Ed. 884; Blair v. United States, supra, 250 U.S. at 281–282, 39 S.Ct. 468, 63 L.Ed. 979. In this respect we find guidance in the Supreme Court decisions regarding conflicts between First Amendment interests and legislative investigatory needs;[3] the Court has required the sacrifice of First Amendment freedoms only where a compelling need for the particular testimony in question is demonstrated.[4]

[4] DeGregory v. Attorney General of New Hampshire, 383 U.S. 825 (1966); Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee, 372 U.S. 539 (1963); NAACP v. Alabama,

If the Grand Jury may require appellant to make available to it information obtained by him in his capacity as news gatherer, then the Grand Jury and the Department of Justice have the power to appropriate appellant's investigative efforts to their own behalf—to convert him after the fact into an investigative agent of the Government. The very concept of a free press requires that the news media be accorded a measure of autonomy; that they should be free to pursue their own investigations to their own ends without fear of governmental interference; and that they should be able to protect their investigative processes. To convert news gatherers into Department of Justice investigators is to invade the autonomy of the press by imposing a governmental function upon them. To do so where the result is to diminish their future capacity as news gatherers is destructive of their public function.[5] To accomplish this where it has not been shown to be essential to the Grand Jury inquiry simply cannot be justified in the public interest.

Further it is not unreasonable to expect journalists everywhere to temper their reporting so as to reduce the probability that they will be required to submit to interrogation. The First Amendment guards against governmental action that induces such self-censorship. See New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 279 (1964); Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959).

It was on such considerations as these that the balance was struck by the District Court. It ruled:

> "When the exercise of the grand jury power of testimonial compulsion so necessary to the effective functioning of the court may impinge upon or repress First Amendment rights or freedom of speech, press and association, which centuries of experience have found to be indispensable to the survival of a free society, such power shall not be exercised in a manner likely to do so until there has been a clear showing of a compelling and overriding national interest that cannot be served by any alternative means."

Finding that the Government had shown no compelling or overriding national interest for testimony of the sort specified, the District Court imposed the limits we have set forth earlier in this opinion. It reserved jurisdiction to modify its order on a showing of such governmental interest which cannot be served by means other than by appellant's testimony.

We agree with the District Court that the First Amendment requires this qualified privilege, and we find nothing unreasonable in the terms in which it was there defined.[6]

ATTENDANCE

We have noted, the issue upon this appeal goes beyond the question of a privilege to decline to respond to interrogation in certain areas. The District Court ruled that, although protected by its limited privilege, Caldwell was required to respond to the subpoena by appearing before the Grand Jury to answer questions not privileged. Appellant contends that his mere appearance before the Grand Jury will result in loss of his news sources. The Government questions this result.

357 U.S. 449, 460–67 (1958); Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 235 (1957); Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178 (1957); United States v. Rumely, 345 U.S. 41 (1953). It is necessary that, as the investigation proceeds, step-by-step, "an adequate foundation for inquiry must be laid." Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee, supra, at 557.

[5] It is a paradox of the Government's position that, if groups like the Black Panthers cease taking reporters like appellant into their confidence, these journalists will, in the future, be unable to serve a public function either as news gatherers or as prosecution witnesses.

[6] Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir.) cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910, 79 S.Ct. 237, 3 L.Ed.2d 231 (1958), is not to the contrary. That case involved a libel suit in which an author attributed alleged defamatory remarks reported by her to a "network executive." The author, when called as a witness in the libel action against the network, claimed a First Amendment privilege not to disclose the informant's identity and was held in contempt for her refusal to divulge the source.

The Second Circuit (per Judge, now Mr. Justice, Stewart) affirmed the judgment of contempt. But, in doing so, it accepted the proposition "that compulsory disclosure of confidential sources of information may entail an abridgement of press freedom * * *" Id., at 548. The test was "whether the interest to be served by compelling the testimony of the witness in the present case justifies some impairment of this First Amendment freedom." Id. In that case the court noted that it was "not dealing here with the use of the judicial process to force a wholesale disclosure of a newspaper's confidential sources of news nor with a case where the identity of the news source is of doubtful relevance or materiality." Id., at 549–550. There the information was essential for the trial of plaintiff's case; "the question asked of appellant went to the heart of plaintiff's claim." Id. Thus an over-riding need for the specific testimony was shown.

The affidavits on file cast considerable light on the process of gathering news about militant organizations.[7] It is apparent that the relationship which an effective privilelge in this area must protect is a very tenuous and unstable one. Unlike the relation between an attorney and his client or a physician and his patient, relationships between journalists and news sources like the Panthers are not rooted in any service the journalist can provide his informant apart from the publication of the information obtained. Goldstein, "Newsmen and their Confidential Sources," New Republic 13 (March 21, 1970). The relationship depends on trust and confidence that is constantly subject to reexamination and that depends in turn on actual knowledge of how news information imparted have been handled and on continuing reassurance that the handling has been discreet.[8]

This reassurance disappears when the reporter is called to testify behind closed doors. The secrecy that surrounds Grand Jury testimony necessarily introduces uncertainty in the minds of those who fear a betrayal of their confidences. These uncertainties are compounded by the subtle nature of the journalist-informer relation. The demarcation between what is confidential and what is for publication is not sharply drawn and often depends upon the particular context or timing of the use of the information. Militant groups might very understandably fear that, under the pressure of examination before a Grand Jury, the witness may fail to protect their confidence with quite the same sure judgment he invokes in the normal course of his professional work.

The Government characterizes this anticipated loss of communication as Black Panther reprisal; as manifesting a Black Panther demand that, "if you subpoena Caldwell, we will never speak to you again." It argues, that it is unthinkable that the American people would capitulate to such extortion.

[7] One reporter for the New York Times states: "[O]n every story there is a much subtler and much more important form of communication at work between a reporter and his sources. It is built up over a period of time working with and writing about an organization, a person, or a group of persons. The reporter and the source each develops a feeling for what the other will do. The reporter senses how far he can go in writing before the source will stop communicating with him. The source, on the other hand, senses how much he can talk and act freely before he has to close off his presence and his information from the reporter. It is often through such subtle communication that the best and truest stories are written and printed in The Times, or any other newspaper."

Appellant relates his own experiences as follows:

"I began covering and writing articles about the Black Panthers almost from the time of their inception, and I myself found that in those first months that they were very brief and reluctant to discuss any substantive matter with me. However, as they realized I could be trusted and that my sole purpose was to collect my information and present it objectively in the newspaper and that I had no other motive, I found that not only were the party leaders available for in-depth interviews but also the rank and file members were cooperative in aiding me in the newspaper stories that I wanted to do. During the time that I have been covering the party, I have noticed other newspapermen representing legitimate organizations in the news media being turned away because they were not known and trusted by the party leadership.

"As a result of the relationship that I have developed, I have been able to write lengthy stories about the Panthers that have appeared in The New York Times and have been of such a nature that other reporters who have not known the Panthers have not been able to write. Many of these stories have appeared in up to 50 or 60 other newspapers around the country.

"The Black Panther Party's method of operation with regard to members of the press is significantly different from that of other organizations. For instance, press credentials are not recognized as being of any significance. In addition, interviews are not normally designated as being 'backgrounders' or 'off the record' or 'for publication' or 'on the record.' Because no substantive interviews are given until a relationship of trust and confidence is developed between the Black Panther Party members and reporter, statements are rarely made to such reporters on an expressed 'on' or 'off' the record basis. Instead, an understanding is developed over a period of time between the Black Panther Party members and the reporter as to matters which the Black Panther Party wishes to disclose for publication and those matters which are given in confidence."

He concludes:

"* * * if I am forced to appear in secret grand jury proceedings, my appearance alone would be interpreted by the Black Panthers and other dissident groups as a possible disclosure of confidences and trusts and would similarly destroy my effectiveness as a newspaperman."

A fellow black reporter, on leave of absence from The New York Times, states:

"From my experience, I am certain that a black reporter called upon to testify about black activist groups will lose his credibility in the black community generally. His testifying will also make it more difficult for other reporters to cover that community. The net result, therefore, will be to diminish seriously the meaningful news available about an important segment of our population."

[8] This is not necessarily true of every news source. In political and diplomatic areas where the source is an undercover tipster the relationship may well be sufficiently protected by a privilege not to disclose the source.

But it is not an extortionate threat we face. It is human reaction as reasonable to expect as that a client will leave his lawyer when his confidence is shaken. The news source has placed no price tag or exaction on enjoyment of First Amendment freedoms save its continuing confidence in the discretion of the reporter.[9]

As the Government points out, loss of such a sensitive news source can also result from its reaction to indiscreet or unfavorable reporting or from a reporter's association with Government agents or persons disapproved of by the news source. Loss in such a case, however, results from an exercise of the choice and prerogative of a free press. It is not the result of Government compulsion.

We conclude that the privilege not to answer certain questions does not, by itself, adequately protect the First Amendment freedoms at stake in this area; that without implementation in the manner sought by appellant the privilege would fail in its very purpose.

On the other side of the balance is the Grand Jury's right to summon this witness before it and in secrecy compel him to answer questions or to resort to his privilege. It is not the right to secure appearance and testimony that is itself in issue; the District Court's protective order alone would suffice were that all. It is the right to compel presence at a secret interrogation with which we are concerned.

Throughout history secret interrogation has posed problems and caused unease. See, e.g., Note, "An Historical Argument for the Right to Counsel During Police Interrogation," 73 Yale L.J. 1000, 1034–45 (1964). We do not doubt that secret interrogation is in general essential to the integrity and effectiveness of the Grand Jury process. However, implicit in the extraordinary nature of secret interrogations, is the possibility of conflict with basic rights. When this is shown to occur it is appropriate to inquire into the need in the particular case for the specific incursion. Since compulsion to attend and testify entails the exercise of judicial process, it is appropriate that the inquiry be judicially entertained.

The question, then, is whether the injury to First Amendment liberties which mere attendance threatens can be justified by the demonstrated need of the Government for appellant's testimony as to those subjects not already protected by the privilege.

Appellant asserted in affidavit that there is nothing to which he could testify (beyond that which he has already made public and for which, therefore, his appearance is unnecessary) that is not protected by the District Court's order. If this is true—and the Government apparently has not believed it necessary to dispute it—appellant's response to the subpoena would be a barren performance—one of no benefit to the Grand Jury. To destroy appellant's capacity as news gatherer for such a return hardly makes sense. Since the cost to the public of excusing his attendance is so slight, it may be said that there is here no public interest of real substance in competition with the First Amendment freedoms that are jeopardized.

If any competing public interest is ever to arise in a case such as this (where First Amendment liberties are threatened by mere appearance at a Grand Jury investigation) it will be an occasion in which the witness, armed with his privilege, can still serve a useful purpose before the Grand Jury. Considering the scope of the privilege embodied in the protective order, these occasions would seem to be unusual. It is not asking too much of the Government to show that such an occasion is presented here.

In light of these considerations we hold that where it has been shown that the public's First Amendment right to be informed would be jeopardized by requiring a journalist to submit to secret Grand Jury interrogation, the Government must respond by demonstrating a compelling need for the witness's presence before judicial process properly can issue to require attendance.

We go no further than to announce this general rule. As we noted at the outset, this is a case of first impression. The courts can learn much about the problems in this area as they gain more experience in dealing with them. For the present, we lack the omniscience to spell out the details of the Government's burden[10] or the type of proceeding that would accommodate efforts to meet that

[9] Quite a different situation would be presented were the demand unrelated to the privileged relationship: E.g. "The police must free our leader."

[10] Appellant, in his brief to this court, has carefully spelled out what he feels would be required:

"Specifically, we contend that, before it may compel a newsman to appear in grand jury proceedings under circumstances that would seriously damage the news-gathering and reporting abilities of the press, the Government must show at least: (1) that there are burden.[11] The fashioning of specific rules and procedures appropriate to the particular case can better be left to the District Court under its retained jurisdiction. Cf., White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253 (1963).

Finally we wish to emphasize what must already be clear: the rule of this case is a narrow one. It is not every news source that is as sensitive as the Black Panther Party has been shown to be respecting the performance of the "establishment" press or the extent to which that performance is open to view. It is not every reporter who so uniquely enjoys the trust and confidence of his sensitive news source.

THE FOURTH AMENDMENT ISSUE

Appellant also moved to quash the Grand Jury subpoenas on the ground that they were based upon information obtained by unconstitutional surveillance of his interviews with Black Panther members. He sought a hearing to determine whether the subpoenas were so obtained. Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165 (1969). The District Court denied the motion solely on the ground that appellant lacked standing to raise the Fourth Amendment contention. This is assigned as error.

In light of our disposition of the First Amendment question in this case, we need not reach this issue. The United States might never meet the First Amendment burden imposed upon it by the District Court order as here implemented. Even if the Government does meet that burden, the court may not have to reach this Fourth Amendment claim; the Government's showing of need for appellant's testimony may disclose a basis for the Government's information which would present no Fourth Amendment problem. If such a problem is presented it could then be discussed in light of the specific facts.

Accordingly, we regard decision upon this question as unnecessary to the present disposition of the case. We reserve the issue and decline to reach it here.

Reversed and remanded with instructions that the judgment of contempt and the order directing attendance before the Grand Jury be vacated. The District Court under its retained jurisdiction may entertain such further proceedings as may be initiated by the United States.

JAMESON, District Judge (concurring):

This case presents narrow issues in the "delicate and difficult" task of reconciling the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of the press with the fair administration of justice, including the broad investigatory power of a grand jury and the obligation of a witness to testify. While perhaps unnecessary for a determination of this appeal, it is helpful, in my opinion, to note the guidelines for resolving conflicts in this sensitive area, as summarized by Judge, now Mr. Justice, Stewart, in Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545, 548–549 (2d Cir.) cert. denied 358 U.S. 910, 79 S. Ct. 237, 3 L. Ed. 2d 231 (1958):

"But freedom of the press, precious and vital though it is to a free society, is not an absolute. What must be determined is whether the interest to be served by compelling the testimony of the witness in the present case justifies some impairment of this First Amendment freedom. That kind of determination often presents a 'delicate and difficult' task. (Citing cases). * * *

"* * * Freedom of the press, hard-won over the centuries by men of courage, is basic to a free society. But basic too are courts of justice, armed with the power to discover truth. The concept that it is the duty of a witness to testify in a court of law has roots fully as deep in our history as does the guarantee of a free press.

"It would be a needless exercise in pedantry to review here the historic development of that duty. Suffice it to state that at the foundation of the Republic the obligation of a witness to testify and the correlative right of a litigant to enlist reasonable grounds to believe the journalist has information, (2) specifically relevant to an identified episode that the grand jury has some factual basis for investigating as a possible violation of designated criminal statutes within its jurisdiction, and (3) that the Government has no alternative sources of the same or equivalent information whose use would not entail an equal degree of incursion upon First Amendment freedoms. Once this minimal showing has been made, it remains for the courts to weigh the precise degree of investigative need that thus appears against the demonstrated degree of harm to First Amendment interests involved in compelling the journalist's testimony." While there is much to commend this suggestion, we are not certain that it represents the best or most satisfactory formulation of the requirement. See, for example, People v. Dohrn, et al., Circuit Court of Cook County, Criminal Division, No. 69–3808, May 20, 1970.

[11] Appellant suggests that the Government's specification of need could be presented in camera to the District Court with appellant or his counsel present.

judicial compulsion of testimony were recognized as incidents of the judicial power of the United States. (Citing cases). * * *

"Without question, the exaction of this duty impinges sometimes, if not always, upon the First Amendment freedoms of the witness. Material sacrifice and the invasion of personal privacy are implicit in its performance. The freedom to choose whether to speak or be silent disappears. * * *

"If an additional First Amendment liberty—the freedom of the press—is here involved, we do not hesitate to conclude that it too must give place under the Constitution to a paramount public interest in the fair administration of justice. * * * ."

As stated in the court's opinion (note 6) Garland v. Torre was a civil action for libel.[1] The obligation to appear and testify is even stronger and the scope of inquiry is broader in grand jury investigations.[2]

The First Amendment rights of appellant were recognized fully by Judge Zirpoli in providing for the protective order discussed in the court's opinion. While not conceding the validity or propriety of the qualified privilege granted appellant, the Government did not seek review of that order on this appeal.[3]

The order entered by the district court is adequate to protect any unnecessary impingement of First Amendment rights after the appearance of the witness before the grand jury. Accordingly we are concerned with the narrow question of whether the Government's showing of a "compelling and overriding national interest that cannot be served by any alternative means" may be required in advance of the issuance of a subpoena.

Appellant did not have any express constitutional right to decline to appear before the grand jury. This is a duty required of all citizens. Nor has Congress enacted legislation to accord any type of privilege to a news reporter.[4] In my opinion the order of the district court could properly be affirmed, and this would accord with the customary procedure of requiring a witness to seek a protective order after appearing before the grand jury. I have concluded, however, that Judge Merrill's opinion properly holds that the same result may be achieved by requiring the Government to demonstrate the compelling need for the witness's presence prior to the issuance of a subpoena and in this manner avoid any unnecessary impingement of First Amendment rights.

As Judge Merrill has suggested, this is a case of first impression. It would seem that the district court could develop procedures which would not unduly hamper or interfere with the investigatory powers of the grand jury. The Government would have the same burden, except that it would make its showing at a hearing in advance of the issuance of subpoenas rather than after the witness appears and seeks a protective order.

APPLICATION OF EARL CALDWELL AND THE NEW YORK TIMES COMPANY FOR AN ORDER QUASHING SUBPOENAS

Misc. No. 10426

ORDER OF THE COURT

This matter comes before the Court on the motion of Earl Caldwell and The New York Times Company to quash or modify a subpoena served upon Mr. Caldwell on March 16, 1970, summoning him to appear and testify before the grand jury sitting in this District. The motion as originally filed also sought the quashing of a grand jury subpoena served upon Mr. Caldwell on February 2, 1970; but at oral argument of the matter on April 3, 1970 the Government withdrew the February 2 subpoena, and the parties have agreed that the motion to quash that subpoena is now moot.

With regard to the March 16 subpoena, the Court has read and considered the memoranda, supplementary memoranda and affidavits filed by the movants and by the Government, and the briefs and annexed affidavits filed by the following amicae curiae: The American Civil Liberties Union (together with its affiliates of Northern and Southern California), The Associated Press, Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., Newsweek, Inc., and the Reporters' Committee on Freedom of the Press.

The Court has also judicially noticed, read and considered a series of articles authored by Earl Caldwell and published in The New York Times. Copies of these articles were furnished to the Court and the Government by the movants, and will be filed by the Court together with its order, for the convenience of the Court of Appeals in the event of an appeal. Finally, the Court has read and considered the memorandum and exhibits filed by the Government in Miscellaneous No. 10410, in support of its Application for Immunity for Sherrie Bursey and Brenda Joyce Presley. At oral argument in the present matter, counsel for movants was granted leave to make this memorandum and its exhibits part of the record herein, and a copy of it will also be filed herewith.

On April 3, 1970, the Court heard and considered oral argument on behalf of the parties and of Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. as amicus curiae. At the conclusion of the argument, the Court announced its opinion, which was filed on April 6, 1970. For the reasons stated in that opinion, the Court is satisfied that The New York Times Company has standing to join with Earl Caldwell in the motion to quash the subpoena of March 16.

Upon the record herein, it appears:

(1) That the testimony of Earl Caldwell sought to be compelled by the subpoena of March 16 will relate to activities of members of the Black Panther Party;

(2) That Mr. Caldwell's knowledge of those activities derived in substantial part from statements and information given to him, as a professional journalist, by members of the Black Panther Party, within the scope of a relationship of trust and confidence;

(3) That confidential relationships of this sort are commonly developed and maintained by professional journalists, and are indispensable to their work of gathering, analyzing and publishing the news;

(4) That compelled disclosure of information received by a journalist within the scope of such confidential relationships jeopardizes those relationships and thereby impairs the journalist's ability to gather, analyze and publish the news;

(5) Specifically, that in the absence of a protective order by this Court delimiting the scope of interrogation of Earl Caldwell by the grand jury, his appearance and examination before the jury will severely impair and damage his confidential relationships with members of the Black Panther

Party and other militants, and thereby severely impair and damage his ability to gather, analyze and publish news concerning them; and that it will also damage and impair the abilities of other reporters for The New York Times Company and others to gather, analyze and publish news concerning them; and

(6) That the Government has shown no compelling and overriding national interest in requiring Mr. Caldwell to give testimony before the grand jury that would invade and jeopardize his confidential relationships with members of the Black Panther Party.

Accordingly, pursuant to the Court's opinion of April 6, 1970, it is hereby ORDERED:

(1) That if and when Earl Caldwell is directed to appear before the grand jury pursuant to the subpoena of March 16, 1970, he shall not be required to reveal confidential associations, sources or information received, developed or maintained by him as a professional journalist in the course of his efforts to gather news for dissemination to the public through the press or other news media.

(2) That specifically without limiting paragraph (1), Mr. Caldwell shall not be required to answer questions concerning statements made to him or information given to him by members of the Black Panther Party unless such statements or information were given to him for publication or public disclosure;

(3) That, to assure the effectuation of this order, Mr. Caldwell shall be permitted to consult with his counsel at any time he wishes during the course of his appearance before the grand jury;

(4) That, except to the extent set forth in paragraphs (1) through (3), the motion to quash or modify the subpoena of March 16, 1970, is denied;

(5) That the Court will entertain a motion for modification of this order at any time upon a showing by the Government of a compelling and overriding national interest in requiring Mr. Caldwell's testimony which cannot be served by any alternative means; and that the Court retains jurisdiction of this matter for the purposes of entertaining such a motion or other motions by any party for the implementation or modification of this order; and

(6) That this order and the return date of the subpoena of March 16, 1970, are stayed until April 26, 1970; and in the event that any party hereby files a notice of appeal of this order on or before April 26, 1970, then this order and the return date of the subpoena are further stayed until final disposition of the appeal, or until further order of this Court.

For the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division

CHICAGO JOINT BOARD, AMALGAMATED CLOTHING WORKERS OF AMERICA, AFL–CIO, PLAINTIFF v. CHICAGO TRIBUNE COMPANY, CHICAGO AMERICAN PUBLISHING COMPANY AND FIELD ENTERPRISES, INC., DEFENDANTS

(No. 69 C 1898)

MEMORANDUM OPINION

Defendant's Motions for Summary Judgment

Plaintiff's Motion for Preliminary Injunction

This action arises from the refusal of the defendants, the Chicago Tribune Co. (Tribune), the Chicago American Publishing Co. (American), and Field Enterprises, Inc. (Field), to publish in their respective newspapers an advertisement submitted by the plaintiff, Chicago Joint Board, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, AFL–CIO (Union). The plaintiff is seeking both injunctive relief and compensatory and exemplary damages.

Plaintiff is a national labor union with numerous local unions in the Chicagoland area. Defendant Tribune is the owner and publisher of a major Chicago newspaper, the Chicago Tribune. Defendant American, which owns and publishes another major Chicago newspaper, Chicago Today, is a wholly owned subsidiary of defendant Tribune. Field is the owner and publisher of the Chicago Sun-Times and the Chicago Daily News, two other major metropolitan dailies.

Union is currently involved in a dispute with Marshall Field & Co., the owner and operator of Chicago's largest retail department store, regarding the sale of imported men's and boys' clothing. Marshall Field & Co. is a leading Chicagoland outlet for imported clothing. It is Union's position that the unrestricted sale of imported men's and boys' clothing will eliminate jobs for American workers manufacturing such clothing, that such a result would impose a hardship on those workers specifically and the American public generally, and that, consequently, retail outlets of foreign made clothing should refrain from the purchase and resale of such goods and the public should not buy them until such time as the exporting nations voluntarily agree to quotas on the amount of clothing to be sent into the United States.

During the course of this dispute, which continues at this time, Union prepared and submitted to defendants an advertisement for publication in their respective newspapers. The ad explained why plaintiff was picketing Marshall Field & Co. and set forth Union's position on the sale of imported men's and boys' clothing. All four major metropolitan newspapers refused to publish the ad.

In Count I of its complaint, Union contends that defendants are quasi-public entities whose refusal to publish is a violation of plaintiff's constitutional rights to free speech and equal protection. Count II alleges that defendants' refusal to publish Union's ad constitutes a breach of contract, which contract arises from plaintiff's acceptance of an alleged standing offer by the defendants to print any lawful advertisement. Count III alleges that plaintiff justifiably relied to their detriment on representations by the defendants to the effect that they would publish any lawful advertisement. In its prayer for relief, Union asks that the defendants be permanently enjoined from refusing to publish the submitted ad, that during the pendancy of this action similar equitable relief be afforded, or that defendants be enjoined from publishing any advertisement of Marshall Field & Co. for or including imported men's or boys' clothing. Union also seeks $1,000 in compensatory damages and $5,000 in exemplary damages.

Presently before the court are plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction and defendants' motions for summary judgment. The motion for preliminary injunction seeks the equitable relief found in the prayer of plaintiff's complaint. Field's motion for summary judgment contends that the complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. In addition to this contention, the other defendants, in their motion for summary judgment, contend that this court lacks federal jurisdiction and that the granting of requested relief would violate defendants' rights of freedom of the press and free speech under the federal and state constitutions.

Initially, we note that summary judgment is appropriate where, as here, there are no material factual issues in dispute and only legal issues need be resolved. Silverstein v. United States, 293 F. Supp. 1106, 1110 (N.D. Ill. 1968).

Counts II and III, which are based on contractual or quasi-contractual theories, have not been supported by any discussion in plaintiff's brief and may be dismissed easily. Under general contract theory, the presumption is that general advertising aimed at the public is not an offer to enter a contract.

> "Neither the advertiser nor the reader of his notice understands that the latter is empowered to close the deal without further expression by the former. Such advertisements are understood to be mere requests to consider and examine and negotiate; and no one can reasonably regard them otherwise unless the circumstances are exceptional and the words used are very plain and clear." 1 Corbin, Contracts § 25, at 75 (1963).

Cf. Wall v. World Publishing Co., 263 P. 2d 1010, 1012 (Okla. 1953) (absent express promise, invitation by newspaper to readers to write letters on matters of public interest is not offer to publish all letters received in response).

None of the defendants have explicitly extended an offer to the general public to publish any lawful advertisement which is submitted for publication by a party who is willing and able to pay the standard advertising rate, nor has any defendant so represented that such a policy exists. In plain and clear words each have reserved the right to reject any advertisement. See The Chicago Tribune Advertising Acceptability Guide, p. 3, submitted as Exhibit B to Complaint; "General Advertising Rates: Chicago Tribune, Chicago Today." (p. 12) submitted as Exhibit A to Affidavit, ¶ 3, of Mr. Charles B. Jordan; Affidavit of Mr. Howell Jones, p. 2. Parenthetically, the Tribune guidelines discuss the newspapers concern with honesty, taste and effectiveness, and indicate that the newspaper will exclude material which, for instance, it feels is misleading, unfair, indecent or illegal. At this time, we need make no evaluation as to the reasonableness of this policy. It is sufficient for the purposes of ruling on the motion for summary judgment to find that the policy of reserving the right to reject advertisement exists and is apparent from a review of the newspapers various pamphlets concerning advertising.

Defendants' motions for summary judgment is granted as to Counts II and III.

We turn now to a consideration of the issues presented in the first count of the Complaint. As summarized previously, it is plaintiff's thesis that the defendants are quasi-public entities whose refusal to publish an advertisement setting forth plaintiff's position on a public issue is a violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights to free speech and equal protection. Defendants' position is that their acts are private in nature and not subject to the asserted constitutional restrictions.

The first amendment to the United States Constitution provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press . . ." While by its language, this amendment is binding only on the national government, it has been extended through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to prohibit the impairment of fundamental rights by the various states, Fiske v. Kansas, 274 U.S. 380, 387 (1927); Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 666 (1925). Yet, while the Fourteenth Amendment affords protection from state action as well as that from the national government, it does not protect against wrongs done by private persons. United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 755 (1966); Motley v. Virginia Hardware and Manufacturing Co., 287 F. Supp. 790 793 (W.D. Va. 1968). As the "distinction between purely private discrimination and discrimination pursuant to 'state action'" persists, Huey v. Barloga, 277 F. Supp. 864, 869 (N.D. Ill. 1967), "(i)t is elementary that in order to establish a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, there must be 'state action' which results in deprivation of a right, privilege or immunity protected by that Amendment." Rogers v. Provident Hospital, 241 F. Supp. 633, 636–37 (N.D. Ill. 1965).

The state action requirement has, of course, been applied to numerous situations besides those involving official governmental entities. In each case, the private or non-governmental conduct has related to an area of vital public concern. One group of such cases involves private ownership and control of the physical premises on which people live or work. Thus, in Marsh v. Alabama, 328 U.S. 501 (1946) the Supreme Court held that a company town's refusal to permit use of its streets for the distribution of religious literature violated the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court reasoned:

> "Ownership does not always mean absolute dominion. The more an owner, for his advantage, opens up his property for use by the public in general, the more do his rights become circumscribed by the statutory and constitutional rights of those who use it. . . .
> "Whether a corporation or a municipality owns or possesses the town the public in either case has an identical interest in the functioning of the community in such manner that the channels of communication remain free."
> Id. at 506–507.

The Marsh rationale was recently adopted in Food Employees v. Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308 (1968), where the Court held that pickets' constitutional rights were violated when a shopping center and supermarket refused to permit picketing on their premises.

Other cases relied on by plaintiff and holding private conduct to be state action for certain constitutional purposes do not concern ownership of property or territorial control. See, e.g., Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 365 U.S. 715 (1961) (refusal of private restaurant located in a publicly owned and operated automobile parking facility to serve a person solely because of his color violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment); Terry v.

Adams, 345 U.S. 461 (1953) (refusal of private political association to permit otherwise qualified Negroes to participate in private elections deprived petitioners effective participation in public election contrary to Fifteenth Amendment); Marjorie Webster Junior College, Inc., v. Middle States Association of Colleges and Secondary School, Inc.,—F. Supp.—, (D.D.C. July 23, 1969) (refusal of regional educational association to consider plaintiff for accreditation and membership solely because it was not a non-profit organization violated the Fourteenth Amendment).

Of course, none of these cases, on their face, factually resembles the instant action. Plainly, not one case concerns privately owned newspapers. Only two of the cases, Marsh and Logan Valley, directly involves the First Amendment freedoms at issue here.

Moreover, the differences between the defendants in this case and those in the cases cited by plaintiff go far beyond the obvious fact that defendants here are newspapers while the defendants in the other cases were different kinds of private concerns. First and foremost, the press is treated with special Constitutional regard. No other private industry or organization has been afforded any protection similar to that granted to the press under the First Amendment. The only other industry that was ever treated specially in the Constitution was the liquor industry, but the Eighteenth Amendment was short lived, being repealed within fourteen years by the Twenty-First Amendment. Consequently, any attempted regulation of the press' freedom stands in a different Constitutional light and must be viewed differently than regulations of other forms of private commerce and association.

Second, the relation of the press to the government is functionally distinguishable from that relationship which exists between other private entities and the state. For instance, the restaurant in the Burton case was the lessee of an agency created pursuant to Delaware law. While it was considered an " 'impossible task' " "to fashion and apply a precise formula for recognition of state responsibility under the Equal Protection Clause," state participation was apparent in the management of the property. Burton v. Wilmington Park Authority, 365 U.S. 715, 722 (1961). Moreover, Delaware, through its agency, had "elected to place its power, property and prestige behind the admitted discrimination," and thereby became recognizable as a "joint participant in the challenged activity." Id. at 725. In Terry, the Jaybird Democratic Association or Jaybird Party was the dominant political group in a Texas county for over sixty years. Winning candidates in the Jaybird primary invariably won in subsequent Democratic primaries and in the general election. Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461, 463 (1953). Essentially, the Court found that as the Jaybird election was a critical part of the general elective process, state involvement in permitting an abuse of its electoral processes was obvious. Id. at 469. The District Court, in Marjorie Webster, held that the educational association's performance of its accreditation function was action in a quasi-governmental capacity. (The opinion noted that selection of educational institutions for federal funds "is frequently dependent upon the accredited status of the applicant," and found that the association's quasi-governmental capacity resulted "by virtue of its role in the distribution of Federal funds under the 'aid to education statutes.' " Marjorie Webster Junior College, Inc. v. Middle States Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools, Inc., F. Supp. (D.D.C., Memorandum Opinion, p. 23, 1969). Essentially, the court agreed that the accreditating function practiced by defendant was inherently governmental, and that the association was exercising delegated powers of a governmental nature. Finally, the Marsh and Logan Valley decisions rested on the finding that the privately owned territory was indistinguishable, in terms of public access and use, from non-privately owned towns, business districts, and shopping centers. Food Employees v. Logan Plaza, 391 U.S. 308, 316–19 (1969).

A similar interdependence of the government and the defendant newspapers is lacking. Quite simply, the business of newspapers is not inherently governmental. Even if we eliminated from our consideration the non-political and non-news aspects of today's major metropolitan papers, the reporting of the day's events and related commentary is not a governmental function. Indeed, the opposite is true. While the government and its officials make news, they do not publish it. Significantly, while a company town may be likened to a municipal corporation and a private shopping center to a public business district, there is no state press, no American equivalent to Izvestia or Pravda.

Surely officials and agencies supply the press with information, but the function of reporting this information rests with the members of the media who may report as they wish or not at all. Then, too, public buildings often have special facilities for members of the press and statutes require publication of various items in the newspapers, e.g., Ill. Rev. Stat. Ch. 24, § 1–2–4 (1967). However, none of these facts compels a conclusion that the press and the government are significantly intertwined or that the role of the press is an inherently governmental one.

Rather than regarded as an extension of the state exercising delegated powers of a governmental nature, the press has long and consistently been recognized as an independent check on governmental power. "The right of free public discussion of the stewardship of public officials was . . ., in Madison's view, a fundamental principle of the American form of government." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 275 (1964). So it is that the national policy favoring full and frank exercise of the press' freedom "may well include vehement, caustic and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials." Id. at 270. See Chafee, Free Speech in the United States 19, 21–22, 29 (1954).

In sum, the function of the press from the days the Constitution was written to the present time has never been conceived as anything but a private enterprise, free and independent of government control and supervision. Rather than state power and participation pervading the operation of the press, the news media and the government have had a history of disassociation.

Not surprisingly, then, plaintiff's position that newspapers are quasi-public bodies has clearly been rejected by the judiciary.

> "In the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, the law seems to be uniformly settled by the great weight of authority throughout the United States that the newspaper publishing business is a private enterprise and is neither a public utility nor affected with the public interest. The decisions appear to hold that even though a particular newspaper may enjoy a virtual monopoly in the area of its publication, this fact is neither unusual nor of important significance. The courts have consistently held that in the absence of statutory regulation on the subject, a newspaper may publish or reject commercial advertising tendered to it as its judgment best dictates without incurring liability for advertisements rejected by it." Approved Personnel, Inc. v. Tribune Co., 177 So.2d 704, 706 (Fla. App. 1965).

Accord, Bloss v. Federated Publications, Inc., 145 N.W.2d 800, 804, (Mich. App. 1966), aff'd 157 N.W.2d 241 (Mich. 1968); J.J. Gordon, Inc. v. Worcester Telegram Publishing Co., 177 N.E.2d 586, 587–88 (Mass. 1961); see generally Annot., Right of Publisher of Newspaper or Magazine in Absence of Contractual Obligation to Refuse Publication of Advertisement, 18 A.L.R. 3d 1286 (1965).

Nor do Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., 395 U.S. 367 (1969), or New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), require a finding that a Constitutional right of access to the printed news media exists. Red Lion upheld the Federal Communications Commission's fairness doctrine imposed on radio and television broadcasters. The Supreme Court's opinion specifically rejected the broadcaster's argument that all communications media be treated equally under the First Amendment. 395 U.S. at 386. Special restrictions on electronic broadcasters were justified on technological grounds which are obviously not applicable to newspapers. Id. at 375–77, 86–87. As then Judge Burger said:

> "A broadcaster has much in common with a newspaper publisher, but he is not in the same category in terms of public obligations imposed by law. A broadcaster seeks and is granted the free and exclusive use of a limited and valuable part of the public domain; when he accepts that franchise it is burdened by enforceable public obligations. A newspaper can be operated at the whim or caprice of its owners; a broadcast station cannot." Office of Communication of United Church of Christ v. F.C.C., 359 F.2d 994, 1003 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

If a right of access existed with regard to newspapers, compliance with the rule would be considerably simpler than it is for broadcasters, for a newspaper is a relatively flexible and expandable commodity. The defect in plaintiff's action is that no such rule exists.

In New York Times, the Supreme Court held that a state court cannot award damages to a public official for defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless plaintiff proves actual malice. In the course of its opinion, the Court recognized the importance of editorial or political as opposed to commercial advertisements. 376 U.S. at 265–66. It found, as we could find in the instant case, that "as an expression of grievance and protest on one of the major issues of our time, (the advertisement) would seem to qualify for the constitutional protection." Id. at 271. That protection does not mean that a newspaper can be forced to publish the ad. See Mid-West Electric Cooperative, Inc. v. West Texas Chamber of Commerce, 369 S.W.2d 842 (Tex. Ct. Civ. App. 1963). It means, rather, that an expression may not be afforded different treatment by the state merely because it appears in the form of an advertisement and not, for instance, orally or on a picket sign or a handbill. 376 U.S. at 266. Consequently, political advertisements are constitutionally protected to no greater and no lesser extent than other forms of speech, and interference by state action with such expression is prohibited. The New York Times case decidely does not stand for the proposition that those who can pay for political advertisements are constitutionally entitled to have them published by private businesses.

We are not insensitive to the problems that have developed or may arise because of a lack of access to the market place of ideas. One of the tragedies of our age is that the failure to communicate effectively through conventional means has led some to attempt to persuade unconventionally and often violently. To the extent that the market mechanism is impaired, to the extent that discussion is not effectively full as well as legally free, we think that the public is done a disservice. Yet, if, in many respects private censorship is no better than public censorship, the fact remains that the right to free speech was never intended to include the right to use the other fellow's presses, that the Constitution relates only to government and not private action.

Even those who chide the press' aversion to "novel" and "heretical" ideas recognize that "the daily press cannot be placed at the mercy of the collective vanity of the public." Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1629, 1646, 1677 (1967). In attempting to resolve this dilemma, access would be restricted to "representative groups" or at least not denied unless on "rational grounds." Id. at 1666, 1670, but see 1677. Under a doctrine of open access, the problems inherent in such line-drawing are obvious. Why limit space to representative groups? Do not non-representative groups or individuals need greater assistance? Are there two sides to every issue or three or an indefinite number? Why limit access to the issue-oriented and not to the amateur sports writer or cartoonist? Most important, why limit access to those who can pay, for surely the poor are just as entitled to comment? The mere raising of these questions indicates why such extensive freedom is given to the press. There is scant, if any, middle ground between minor meddling and full abridgment. "(L)iberty of the press is in peril as soon as the government tries to compel what is to go into a newspaper." 2 Chaffe, Government and Mass Communications 633 (1947) (See generally at 624–650). Thus even though some abuse was considered inevitable, the alternative cure was thought by Madison to be worse than the disease, Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 691, 716 (1931), and newspapers were and are left free to be impartial or biased, foolish or wise.

If, in fact, concentrations of private media power are stultifying, the appropriate approach to secure a right of access would be by "experimental, innovative legislation" or Constitutional amendments. Barron, supra, at 1670, 1676. However, this court does not sit as a creative legislative body, nor do we accept the admittedly "rather rabid conception of 'state action,'" Id. at 1669, that would compel private newspapers to print political advertisements.

With respect to Count I, the absence of state action relieves the court of civil rights jurisdiction and no other claim is stated upon which relief might be granted. Defendants' motions for summary judgment are granted. Plaintiff's motion for injunctive relief is denied. The cause is dismissed.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit

[June 9, 1969]

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Federal Communications Commission has for many years imposed on radio and television broadcasters the requirement that discussion of public issues be presented on broadcast stations, and that each side of those issues must be given fair coverage. This is known as the fairness doctrine, which originated very early in the history of broadcasting and has maintained its present outlines for some time. It is an obligation whose content has been defined in a long series of FCC rulings in particular cases, and which is distinct from the statutory requirement of § 315 of the Communications Act[1] that equal time be allotted all qualified candidates for public office. Two aspects of the fairness doctrine, relating to personal attacks in the context of controversial public issues and to political editorializing were codified more precisely in the form of FCC regulations in 1967. The two cases before us now, which were decided separately below, challenge the constitutional and statutory bases of the doctrine and component rules. Red Lion involves the application of the fairness doctrine to a particular broadcast, and RTNDA arises as an action to review the FCC's 1967 promulgation of the personal attack and political editorializing regulations, which were laid down after the Red Lion litigation had begun.

[1] Communications Act of 1934, Tit. III, c. 652, 48 Stat. 1081, as amended, 47 U.S.C. § 301 et seq. Section 315 now reads:

"315. Candidates for public office; facilities; rules.

"(a) If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station: Provided, That such licensee shall have no power of censorship over the material broadcast under the provisions of this section. No obligation is imposed upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate. Appearance by a legally qualified candidate on any—

"(1) bona fide newscast,

"(2) bona fide news interview,

"(3) bona fide news documentary (if the appearance of the candidate is incidental to the presentation of the subject or subjects covered by the news documentary), or

"(4) on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events (including but not limited to political conventions and activities incidental thereto), "shall not be deemed to be use of a broadcasting station within the meaning of this subsection. Nothing in the foregoing sentence shall be construed as relieving broadcasters, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events, from the obligation imposed upon them under this chapter to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance.

"(b) The charges made for the use of any broadcasting station for any of the purposes set forth in this section shall not exceed the charges made for comparable use of such station for other purposes.

"(c) The Commission shall prescribe appropriate rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this section."

The Red Lion Broadcasting Company is licensed to operate a Pennsylvania radio station, WGCB. On November 27, 1964, WGCB carried a 15-minute broadcast by Reverend Billy James Hargis as part of a "Christian Crusade" series. A book by Fred J. Cook entitled "Goldwater—Extremist on the Right" was discussed by Hargis, who said that Cook had been fired by a newspaper for fabricating false charges against city officials; that Cook had then worked for a Communist-affiliated publication; that he had defended Alger Hiss and attacked J. Edgar Hoover and the Central Intelligence Agency; and that he had now written a "book to smear and destroy Barry Goldwater."[2] When Cook heard of the broadcast he concluded that he had been personally attacked and demanded free reply time, which the station refused. After an exchange of letters among Cook, Red Lion, and the FCC, the FCC declared that the Hargis broadcast constituted a personal attack on Cook; that Red Lion had failed to meet its obligation under the fairness doctrine as expressed in Times-Mirror Broadcasting Co., 24 P & F Radio Reg. 404 (1962), to send a tape, transcript, or summary of the broadcast to Cook and offer him reply time; and that the station must provide reply time whether or not Cook would pay for it. On review in the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia,[3] the FCC's position was upheld as constitutional and otherwise proper. 381 F. 2d 908 (1967).

B.

Not long after the Red Lion litigation was begun, the FCC issued a Notice of Proposed Rule Making, 31 Fed. Reg. 5710, with an eye to making the personal attack aspect of the fairness doctrine more precise and more readily enforceable, and also to specify its rules relating to political editorials. After considering written comments supporting and opposing the rules, the FCC adopted them substantially as proposed, 32 Fed. Reg. 10303. Twice amended, 32 Fed. Reg. 11531, 33 Fed. Reg. 5362, the rules were held unconstitutional in the RTNDA litigation by the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit on review of the rule-making proceeding as abridging the freedoms of speech and press. 400 F. 2d 1002 (1968).

[2] According to the record, Hargis asserted that his broadcast included the following statement:

"Now, this paperback book by Fred J. Cook is entitled, 'GOLDWATER—EXTREMIST ON THE RIGHT'. Who is Cook? Cook was fired from the New York World Telegram after he made a false charge publicly on television against an un-named official of the New York City government. New York publishers and NEWSWEEK Magazine for December 7, 1959, showed that Fred Cook and his pal, Eugene Gleason, had made up the whole story and this confession was made to New York District Attorney, Frank Hogan. After losing his job, Cook went to work for the left-wing publication, THE NATION, one of the most scurrilous publications of the left which has championed many communist causes over many years. Its editor, Carry McWilliams, has been affiliated with many communist enterprises, scores of which have been cited as subversive by the Attorney General of the U.S. or by other government agencies . . . Now, among other things Fred Cook wrote for THE NATION, was an article absolving Alger Hiss of any wrong doing . . . there was a 208 page attack on the FBI and J. Edgar Hoover; another attack by Mr. Cook was on the Central Intelligence Agency . . . now this is the man who wrote the book to smear and destroy Barry Goldwater called 'Barry Goldwater—Extremist Of The Right!' "

[3] The Court of Appeals initially dismissed the petition for want of a reviewable order, later reversing itself en banc upon argument by the Government that the FCC rule used here, which permits it to issue "a declaratory ruling terminating a controversy or removing uncertainty," 47 CFR § 1.2, was in fact justified by the Administrative Procedure Act. That Act permits an adjudicating agency, "in its sound discretion, with like effect as in the case of other orders, to issue a declaratory order to terminate a controversy or remove uncertainty." § 5, 60 Stat. 239, 5 U.S.C. § 1004(d). In this case, the FCC could have determined the question of Red Lion's liability to a cease-and-desist order or license revocation, 47 U.S.C. § 312, for failure to comply with the license's condition that the station be operated "in the public interest," or for failure to obey a requirement of operation in the public interest implicit in the ability of the FCC to revoke licenses for conditions justifying the denial of an initial license, 47 U.S.C. § 312 (a)(2), and the statutory requirement that the public interest be served in granting and renewing licenses, 47 U.S.C. §§ 307(a), (d). Since the FCC could have adjudicated these questions it could, under the Administrative Procedure Act, have issued a declaratory order in the course of its adjudication which would have been subject to judicial review. Although the FCC did not comply with all of the formalities for an adjudicative proceeding in this case, the petitioner itself adopted as its own the Government's position that this was a reviewable order, waiving any objection it might have had to the procedure of the adjudication.

As they now stand amended, the regulations read as follows:

"Personal attacks; political editorials.

"(a) When, during the presentation of views on a controversial issue of public importance, an attack is made upon the honesty, character, integrity or like personal qualities of an identified person or group, the licensee shall, within a reasonable time and in no event later than one week after the attack, transmit to the person or group attacked (1) notification of the date, time and identification of the broadcast; (2) a script or tape (or an accurate summary if a script or tape is not available) of the attack; and (3) an offer of a reasonable opportunity to respond over the licensee's facilities.

"(b) The provisions of paragraph (a) of this section shall not be applicable (i) to attacks on foreign groups or foreign public figures; (ii) to personal attacks which are made by legally qualified candidates, their authorized spokesmen, or those associated with them in the campaign, on other such candidates, their authorized spokesmen, or persons associated with the candidates in the campaign; and (iii) to bona fide newscasts, bona fide news interviews, and on-the-spot coverage of a bona fide news event (including commentary or analysis contained in the foregoing programs. but the provisions of paragraph (a) shall be applicable to editorials of the licensee).

"NOTE: The fairness doctrine is applicable to situations coming within (iii), above, and, in a specific factual situation, may be applicable in the general area of political broadcasts (ii), above. See Section 315(a) of the Act, 47 U.S.C. 315(a); Public Notice: Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine in the Handling of Controversial Issues of Public Importance. 29 Fed. Reg. 10415. The categories listed in (iii) are the same as those specified in Section 315(a) of the Act.

"(c) Where a licensee, in an editorial, (i) endorses or (ii) opposes a legally qualified candidate or candidates, the licensee shall, within 24 hours after the editorial, transmit to respectively (i) the other qualified candidate or candidates for the same office or (ii) the candidate opposed in the editorial (1) notification of the date and the time of the editorial; (2) a script or tape of the editorial; and (3) an offer of a reasonable opportunity for a candidate or a spokesman of the candidate to respond over the licensee's facilities: Provided, however, That where such editorials are broadcast within 72 hours prior to the day of the election, the licensee shall comply with the provisions of this subsection sufficiently far in advance of the broadcast to enable the candidate or candidates to have a reasonable opportunity to prepare a response and to present it in a timely fashion." 47 CFR §§ 73.123, 73.300, 73.598, 73.679 (all identical).

C.

Believing that the specific application of the fairness doctrine in Red Lion, and the promulgation of the regulations in RTNDA, are both authorized by Congress and enhance rather than abridge the freedoms of speech and press protected by the First Amendment, we hold them valid and constitutional, reversing the judgment below in RTNDA, and affirming the judgment below in Red Lion.

II.

The history of the emergence of the fairness doctrine and of the related legislation shows that the Commission's action in the Red Lion case did not exceed its authority, and that in adopting the new regulations the Commission was implementing congressional policy rather than embarking on a frolic of its own.

A.

Before 1927, the allocation of frequencies was left entirely to the private sector, and the result was chaos.[4] It quickly became apparent that broadcast frequencies constituted a scarce resource whose use could be regulated and rationalized only by the Government. Without government control, the medium would be of little use because of the cacaphony of competing voices, none of which could be clearly and predictably heard.[5] Consequently, the Federal Radio Commission was established to allocate frequencies among competing applicants in a manner responsive to the public "convenience, interest, or necessity."[6]

[4] Because of this chaos, a series of National Radio Conferences was held between 1922 and 1925, at which it was resolved that regulation of the radio spectrum by the Federal Government was essential and that regulatory power should be utilized to ensure that allocation of this limited resource would be made only to those who would serve the public interest. The 1923 Conference expressed the opinion that the Radio Act of 1912, c. 287, 37 Stat. 302, con-

Very shortly thereafter the Commission expressed its views that the "public interest requires ample play for the free and fair competition of opposing views, and the Commission believes that the principle applies . . . to all discussions of issues of importance to the public." Great Lakes Broadcasting Co., 3 F. R. C. Ann. Rep. 32, 33 (1929). rev'd on other grounds, 37 F. 2d 993, cert. dismissed, 281 U.S. 706 (1930). This doctrine was applied through denial of license renewals or construction permits, both by the FRC, Trinity Methodist Church, South v. FRC, 62 F. 2d 850 (C. A. D. C. Cir. 1932), cert. denied, 288 U.S. 599 (1933), and its successor FCC, Young People's Association for the Propagation of the Gospel, 6 F. C. C. 178 (1938). After an extended period during which the licensee was obliged not only to cover and to cover fairly the views of others, but also to refrain from expressing his own personal views, Mayflower Broadcasting Corp., 8 F. C. C. 333 (1941), the latter limitation on the licensee was abandoned and the doctrine developed into its present form.

There is a twofold duty laid down by the FCC's decisions and described by the 1949 Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F. C. C. 1246 (1949). The broadcaster must give adequate coverage to public issues, United Broadcasting Co., 10 F. C. C. 515 (1945), and coverage must be fair in that it accurately reflects the opposing views. New Broadcasting Co., 6 P & F Radio Reg. 258 (1950). This must be done at the broadcaster's own expense if sponsorship is unavailable. Cullman Broadcasting Co., 25 P & F Radio Reg. 895 (1963). Moreover, the duty must be met by programming obtained at the licensee's own initiative if available from no other source. John J. Dempsey, 6 P & F Radio Reg. 615 (1950); see Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., 19 P & F Radio Reg. 602 (1959); The Evening News Assn., 6 P & F Radio Reg. 283 (1950). The Federal Radio Commission had imposed these two basic duties on broadcasters since the outset. Great Lakes Broadcasting Co., 3 F. R. C. Ann Reg. 32 (1929), rev'd on other grounds, 37 F. 2d 993, cert. denied, 281 U.S. 706 (1930); Chicago Federation of Labor v. FRC, 3 F. R. C. Ann. Rep. 36 (1929), aff'd 41 F. 2d 422 (C. A. D. C. Cir. 1930); KFKB Broadcasting Assn. v. FRC, 47 F. 2d 670 (C. A. D. C. Cir. 1931), and in particular respects the personal attack rules and regulations at issue here have spelled them out in greater detail.

When a personal attack has been made on a figure involved in a public issue, both the doctrine of cases such as Red Lion and Times-Mirror Broadcasting Co., 24 P & F Radio Reg. 404 (1962), and also the 1967 regulations at issue in RTNDA require that the individual attacked himself be offered an opportunity to respond. Likewise, where one candidate is endorsed in a political editorial, the other candidates must themselves be offered reply time to use personally or ferred upon the Secretary of Commerce the power to regulate frequencies and hourse of operation, but when Secretary Hoover sought to implement this claimed power by penalizing the Zenith Radio Corporation for operating on an unauthorized frequency, the 1912 Act was held not to permit enforcement. United States v. Zenith Radio Corporation, 12 F. 2d 614 (D. C. N. D. Ill 1926). Compare Hoover v. Intercity Radio Co., 286 F. 1003 (C. A. D. C. Cir. 1923) (Secretary had no power to deny licenses, but was empowered to assign frequencies). An opinion issued by the Attorney General at Hoover's request confirmed the impotence of the Secretary under the 1912 Act. 35 Op. Atty. Gen. 126 (1926). Hoover thereafter appealed to the radio industry to regulate itself, but his appeal went largely unheeled. See generally L. Schmeckebier, The Federal Radio Commission 1–14 (1932).

[5] Congressman White, a sponsor of the bill enacted as the Radio Act of 1927, commented upon the need for new legislation:

"We have reached the definite conclusion that the right of all our people to enjoy this means of communication can be preserved only by the repudiation of the idea underlying the 1912 law that anyone who will may transmit and by the assertion in its stead of the doctrine that the right of the public to service is superior to the right of any individual. . . . The recent radio conference met this issue squarely. It recognized that in the present state of scientific development there must be a limitation upon the number of broadcasting stations and it recommended that licenses should be issued only to those stations whose operation would render a benefit to the public, are necessary in the public interest, or would contribute to the development of the art. This principle was approved by every witness before your committee. We have written it into the bill. If enacted into law, the broadcasting privilege will not be a right of selfishness. It will rest upon an assurance of public interest to be served." 67 Cong. Rec. 5479.

[6] Radio Act of 1927, c. 1969, § 4, 44 Stat. 1162, 1163. See generally, Davis, The Radio Act of 1927, 13 Va. L. Rev. 611 (1927).

through a spokesman. These obligations differ from the general fairness requirement that issues be presented, and presented with coverage of competing views, in that the broadcaster does not have the option of presenting the attacked party's side himself or choosing a third party to represent that side. But insofar as there is an obligation of the broadcaster to see that both sides are presented, and insofar as that is an affirmative obligation, the personal attack doctrine and regulations do not differ from preceding fairness doctrine. The simple fact that the attacked men or unendorsed candidates may respond themselves or through agents is not a critical distinction, and indeed, it is not unreasonable for the FCC to conclude that the objective of adequate presentation of all sides may best be served by allowing those most closely affected to make the response, rather than leaving the response in the hands of the station which has attacked their candidacies, endorsed their opponents, or carried a personal attack upon them.

B.

The statutory authority of the FCC to promulgate these regulations derives from the mandate to the "Commission from time to time, as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires" to promulgate "such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions . . . as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this chapter. . . ." 47 U.S.C. § 303 and § 303(r).[7] The Commission is specifically directed to consider the demands of the public interest in the course of granting licenses, 47 U.S.C. §§ 307(a), 309(a); renewing them, 47 U.S.C. § 307; and modifying them. Ibid. Moreover, the FCC has included among the conditions of the Red Lion license itself the requirement that operation of the station be carried out in the public interest, 47 U.S.C. § 309(h). This mandate to the FCC to assure that broadcasters operate in the public interest is a broad one, a power "not niggardly but expansive," National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 219 (1943), whose validity we have long upheld. FCC v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 138 (1940); FCC v. RCA Communications, Inc., 346 U.S. 86, 90 (1953); FRC v. Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortgage Co., 289 U.S. 266, 285 (1933). It is broad enough to encompass these regulations.

The fairness doctrine finds specific recognition in statutory form, is in part modeled on explicit statutory provisions relating to political candidates, and is approvingly reflected in legislative history.

In 1959 the Congress amended the statutory requirement of § 315 that equal time be accorded each political candidate to except certain appearances on news programs, but added that this constituted no exception "from the obligation imposed upon them under this Act to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance." Act of September 14, 1959, § 1, 73 Stat. 557, amending 47 U.S.C. § 315(a) (emphasis added). This language makes it very plain that Congress, in 1959, announced that the phrase "public interest," which had been in the Act since 1927, imposed a duty on broadcasters to discuss both sides of controversial public issues. In other words, the amendment vindicated the FCC's general view that the fairness doctrine inhered in the public interest standard. Subsequent legislation enacted into law and declaring the intent of an earlier statute is entitled to great weight in statutory construction.[8] And here this principle is given special force by the equally venerable principle that the construction of a statute by those charged with its execution should be followed unless there are compelling indications that it is wrong,[9] especially when Congress has refused to alter the administrative construction.[10] Here, the Congress has not just kept its silence by refusing to overturn the administrative construction,[11] but has ratified it with positive legislation. Thirty years of consistent administrative construction left undisturbed by Congress until 1959, when that construction was expressly accepted, reinforce the natural conclusion that the public interest language of the Act authorized the Commission to require licensees to use their stations for discussion of public issues, and that the FCC is free to implement this requirement by reasonable rules and regulations which fall short of abridgment of the freedom of speech and press, and of the censorship prescribed by § 326 of the Act.[12] [7] As early as 1930, Senator Dill expressed the view that the Federal Radio Commission had the power to make regulations requiring a licensee to afford an opportunity for presentation of the other side on "public questions." Hearings before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on S. 6, 71st Cong., 2d Sess., at 1616 (1930):

"Senator Dill. Then you are suggesting that the provision of the statute that now requires a station to give equal opportunity to candidates for office shall be applied to all public questions?

"Commissioner Robinson. Of course, I think in the legal concept the law requires it now. I do not see that there is any need to legislate about it. It will evolve one of these days. Somebody will go into court and say, 'I am entitled to this opportunity,' and he will get it.

"Senator Dill. Has the Commission considered the question of making regulations requiring the stations to do that?

"Commissioner Robinson. Oh, no.

"Senator Dill. It would be within the power of the commission, I think, to make regulations on that subject."

[8] Federal Housing Administration v. Darlington, Inc., 358 U.S. 84, 90 (1958); Glidden Co. v. Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530, 541 (1962) (separate opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan, joined by Mr. Justice Brennan and Mr. Justice Stewart). This principle is a venerable one. Alexander v. Alexandria, 5 Cranch 1 (1809); United States v. Freeman, 3 How. 556 (1845); Stockdale v. The Insurance Companies, 20 Wall. 323 (1873).

The objectives of § 315 themselves could readily be circumvented but for the complementary fairness doctrine ratified by § 315. The section applies only to campaign appearances by candidates, and not by family, friends, campaign managers, or other supporters. Without the fairness doctrine, then, a licensee could ban all campaign appearances by candidates themselves from the air [13] and proceed to deliver over his station entirely to the supporters of one slate of candidates, to the exclusion of all others. In this way the broadcaster could have a far greater impact on the favored candidacy than he could by simply allowing a spot appearance by the candidate himself. It is the fairness doctrine as an aspect of the obligation to operate in the public interest, rather than § 315, which prohibits the broadcaster from taking such a step.

The legislative history reinforces this view of the effect of the 1959 amendment. Even before the language relevant here was added, the Senate report on amending § 315 noted that "broadcast frequencies are limited and, therefore, they have been necessarily considered a public trust. Every licensee who is fortunate in obtaining a license is mandated to operate in the public interest and has assumed the obligation of presenting important public questions fairly and without bias." S. Rep. No. 562, 86th Cong., 1st Sess., 8–9 (1959) .See also, specifically adverting to Federal Communications Commission doctrine, id., at 13.

Rather than leave this approval solely in the legislative history, Senator Proxmire suggested an amendment to make it part of the Act. 105 Cong. Rec. 14457. This amendment, which Senator Pastore, a manager of the bill and Chairman of the Senate Committee considered "rather surplusage," 105 Cong. Rec. 14462, constituted a positive statement of doctrine [14] and was altered to the present merely approving language in the conference committee. In explaining the language to the Senate after the committee changes, Senator Pastore said: "We insisted that the provision remain in the bill, to be a continuing reminder and admonition to the Federal Communications Commission and to the broadcasters alike, that we were not abandoning the philosophy that gave birth to section 315, in giving the people the right to have a full and complete discosure of conflicting views on news of interest to the people of the country." 105 Cong. Rec. 17830. Senator Scott, another Senate manager, added that "It is intended to encompass all legitimate areas of public importance which are controversial," not just politics. 105 Cong. Rec. 17831.

[11] An attempt to limit sharply the FCC's power to interfere with programming practices failed to emerge from Committee in 1943. S. 814, 87th Cong., 1st Sess., 4 (1943). See Hearings on S. 814 before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, 78th Cong., 1st Sess. (1943). Also, attempts specifically to enact the doctrine failed in the Radio Act of 1927, 67 Cong., Rec. 12505 (1926) (agreeing to amendment proposed by Senator Dill eliminating coverage of "question affecting the public"), and a similar proposal in the Communications Act of 1934 was accepted by the Senate, 78 Cong. Rec. 8854 (1939) ; see S. Rep. No. 781, 73d Cong., 2d Sess., 8 (1934), but was not included in the bill reported by the House Committee, see H.R. Rep. No. 1850, 73d Cong., 2d Sess. (1934). The attempt which came nearest success was a bill, H.R. 7716, 72d Cong., 1st Sess. (1932), passed by Congress but pocket vetoed by the President in 1933, which would have extended "equal opportunities" whenever a public question was to be voted on at an election or by a government agency. H.R. Rep. No. 2106, 72d Cong., 2d Sess., 6 (1933). In any event, unsuccessful attempts at legislation are not the best of guides to legislative intent. Fogarty v. United States, 340 U.S. 8, 13–14 (1950) ; United States v. United Mine Workers, 330 U.S. 258, 281–282 (1947). A review of some of the legislative history over the years, drawing a somewhat different conclusion, is found in Staff of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Legislative History of the Fairness Doctrine, 90th Cong., 2d Sess. (Comm. Print. 1968). This inconclusive history was, of course. superseded by the specific statutory language added in 1959.

[12] "§ 326. Censorship.

"Nothing in this chapter shall be understood or construed to give the Commission the power of censorship over the radio communications or signals transmitted by any radio station, and no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the Commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication."

[13] John P. Crommelin, 19 P & F Radio Reg. 1392 (1960).

[14] The Proxmire amendment read : "[B]ut nothing in this sentence shall be construed as changing the basic intent of Congress with respect to the provisions of this act, which recognizes that television and radio frequencies are in the public domain, that the license to operate in such frequencies requires operation ih the public interest, and that in newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, on-the-spot coverage of news events, and panel discussions, all sides of public controversies shall be given as equal an opportunity to be heard as is practically possible." 105 Cong. Rec. 14457.

It is true that the personal attack aspect of the fairness doctrine was not actually adjudicated until after 1959, so that Congress then did not have those rules specifically before it. However, the obligation to offer time to reply to a personal attack presaged by the FCC's 1949 Report on Editorializing, which the FCC views as the principal summary of its ratio decidendi in cases in this area:

> "In determining whether to honor specific requests for time, the station will inevitably be confronted with such questions as . . . whether there may not be other available groups or individuals who might be more appropriate spokesmen for the particular point of view than the person making the request. The latter's personal involvement in the controversy may also be a factor which must be considered, for elementary considerations of fairness may dictate that time be allocated to a person or group which has been specifically attacked over the station, where otherwise no such obligation would exist." 13 F. C. C., at 1251–1252.

When the Congress ratified the FCC's implication of a fairness doctrine in 1959 it did not, of course, approve every past decision or pronouncement by the Commission on this subject, or give it a completely free hand for the future. The statutory authority does not go so far. But we cannot say that when a station publishes a personal attack or endorses a political candidate, it is misconstruction of the public interest standard to require the station to offer time for a response rather than to leave the response entirely within the control of the station which has attacked either the candidacies or the men who wish to reply in their own defense. When a broadcaster grants time to a political candidate, Congress itself requires that equal time be offered to his opponents. It would exceed our competence to hold that the Commission is unauthorized by the statute to employ a similar device where personal attacks or political editorials are broadcast by a radio or television station.

In light of the fact that the "public interest" in broadcasting clearly encompasses the presentation of vigorous debate of controversial issues of importance and concern to the public; the fact that the FCC has rested upon that language from its very inception a doctrine that these issues must be discussed, and fairly; and the fact that Congress has acknowledged that the analogous provisions of § 315 are not preclusive in this area, and knowingly preserved the FCC's complementary efforts, we think the fairness doctrine and its component personal attack and political editorializing regulations are a legitimate exercise of congressionally delegated authority. The Communications Act is not notable for the precision of its substantive standards and in this respect the explicit provisions of § 315, and the doctrine and rules at issue here which are closely modeled upon that section, are far more explicit than the generalized "public interest" standard in which the Commission ordinarily finds its sole guidance, and which we have held a broad but adequate standard before. FCC v. RCA Communications, Inc., 346 U.S. 86, 90 (1953); National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 216–217 (1943); FCC v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 138 (1940); FRC v. Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortgage Co., 289 U.S. 266, 285 (1933). We cannot say that the FCC's declaratory ruling in Red Lion, or the regulations at issue in RTNDA, are beyond the scope of the congressionally conferred power to assure that stations are operated by those whose possession of a license serves "the public interest."

III.

The broadcasters challenge the fairness doctrine and its specific manifestations in the personal attack and political editorial rules on conventional First Amendment grounds, alleging that the rules abridge their freedom of speech and press. Their contention is that the First Amendment protects their desire to use their allotted frequencies continuously to broadcast whatever they choose, and to exclude whomever they choose from ever using that frequency. No man may be prevented from saying or publishing what he thinks, or from refusing in his speech or other utterances to give equal weight to the views of his opponents. This right, they say, applies equally to broadcasters.

A.

Although broadcasting is clearly a medium affected by a First Amendment interest, United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U.S. 131, 166 (1948), differences in the characteristics of new media justify differences in the First Amendment standards applied to them.[15] Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495, 503 (1952). For example, the ability of new technology to produce sounds more raucous than those of the human voice justifies restrictions on the sound level, and on the hours and places of use, of sound trucks so long as the restrictions are reasonable and applied without discrimination. Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U. S. 77 (1949).

Just as the Government may limit the use of sound amplifying equipment potentially so noisy that it drowns out civilized private speech, so may the Government limit the use of broadcast equipment. The right of free-speech of a broadcaster, the user of a sound truck, or any other individual does not embrace a right to snuff out the free speech of others. Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945).

When two people converse face to face, both should not speak at once if either is to be clearly understood. But the range of the human voice is so limited that there could be meaningful communications if half the people in the United States were talking and the other half listening. Just as clearly, half the people might publish and the other half read. But the reach of radio signals is incomparably greater than the range of the human voice and the problem of interference is a massive reality. The lack of know-how and equipment may keep many from the air, but only a tiny fraction of those with resources and intelligence can hope to communicate by radio at the same time if intelligible communication is to be had, even if the entire radio spectrum is utilized in the present state of commercially acceptable technology.

It was this fact, and the chaos which ensued from permitting anyone to use any frequency at whatever power level he wished, which made necessary the enactment of the Radio Act of 1927 and the Communications Act of 1934,[16] as the Court has noted at length before. National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 210–214 (1943). It was this reality which at the very least necessitated first the division of the radio spectrum into portions reserved respectively for public broadcasting and for other important radio uses such as amateur operation, aircraft, police, defense, and navigation; and then the subdivision of each portion, and assignment of specific frequencies to individual users or groups of users. Beyond this, however, because the frequencies reserved for public broadcasting were limited in number, it was essential for the Government to tell some applicants that they could not broadcast at all because there was room for only a few.

Where there are substantially more individuals who want to broadcast than there are frequencies to allocate, it is idle to posit an unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish. If 100 persons want broadcast licenses but there are only 10 frequencies to allocate, all of them may have the same "right" to a license; but if there is to be any effective communication by radio, only a few can be licensed and the rest must be barred from the airways. It would be strange if the [15] The general problems raised by a technology which supplants atomized, relatively informal communication with mass media as a prime source of national cohesion and news were discussed at considerable length by Zechariah Chafee in Government and Mass Communications (1947). Debate on the particular implications of this view for the broadcasting industry has continued unabated. A compendium of views appears in Freedom and Responsibility in Broadcasting (Coons ed.) (1961). See also Kalven, Broadcasting, Public Policy, and the First Amendment, 10 J. of Law and Econ. 15 (1967); Ernst, The First Freedom 125–180 (1946); Robinson, Radio Networks and the Federal Government, especially at 75–87 (1943). The considerations which the newest technology brings to bear on the particular problem of this litigation are concisely explored by Louis Jaffe in The Fairness Doctrine, Equal Time, Reply to Personal Attacks, and the Local Service Obligation; Implications of Technological Change (U.S. Government Printing Office, 1968).

[16] The range of controls which have in fact been imposed over the last 40 years, without giving rise to successful constitutional challenge in this Court, is discussed in Emery, Broadcasting and Government: Responsibilities and Regulations (1961); Note, Regulation of Program Content by the FCC, 77 Harv. L. Rev. 701 (1964).

First Amendment, aimed at protecting and furthering communications, prevented the Government from making radio communication possible by requiring licenses to broadcast and by limiting the number of licenses so as not to overcrowd the spectrum.

This has been the consistent view of the Court. Congress unquestionably has the power to grant and deny licenses and to delete existing stations. Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortgage Co., 289 U.S. 266 (1933). No one has a First Amendment right to a license or to monopolize a radio frequency; to deny a station license because "the public interest" requires it "is not a denial of free speech." National Broadcasting Co. v. U.S., 319 U.S. 190, 227 (1943).

By the same token, as far as the First Amendment is concerned those who are licensed stand no better than those to whom licenses are refused. A license permits broadcasting, but the licensee has no constitutional right to be the one who holds the license or to monopolize a radio frequency to the exclusion of his fellow citizens. There is nothing in the First Amendment which prevents the Government from requiring a licensee to share his frequency with others and to conduct himself as a proxy or fiduciary with obligations to present those views and voices which are representative of his community and which would otherwise, by necessity, be barred from the airwaves.

This is not to say that the First Amendment is irrelevant to public broadcasting. On the contrary, it has a major role to play as the Congress itself recognized in § 326, which forbids FCC interference with "the right of free speech by means of radio communications." Because of the scarcity of radio frequencies, the Government is permitted to put restraints on licensees in favor of others whose views should be expressed on this unique medium. But the people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount. See FCC v. Sanders Bros. Radio Station, 309 U.S. 470, 475 (1940); FCC v. Allentown Broadcasting Corp., 349 U.S. 358, 361–362 (1955); Z. Chafee, Government and Mass Communications 546 (1947). It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail, rather than to countenance monopolization of that market, whether it be by the Government itself or a private licensee. Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964); Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616, 630 (1919) (Holmes, J., dissenting). "[S]peech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government." Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 74–75 (1964). See Brennan, The Supreme Court and the Meiklejohn Interpretation of the First Amendment, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 1 (1965). It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here. That right may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the FCC.

B.

Rather than confer frequency monopolies on a relatively small number of licensees, in a Nation of 200,000,000, the Government could surely have decreed that each frequency should be shared among all or some of those who wish to use it, each being assigned a portion of the broadcast day or the broadcast week. The ruling and regulations at issue here do not go quite so far. They assert that under specified circumstances, a licensee must offer to make available a reasonable amount of broadcast time to those who have a view different from that which has already been expressed on his station. The expression of a political endorsement, or of a personal attack while dealing with a controversial public issue, simply triggers this time-sharing. As we have said, the First Amendment confers no right on licensees to prevent others from broadcating on "their" frequencies and no right to an unconditional monopoly of a scarce resource which the Government has denied others the right to use.

In terms of constitutional principle, and as enforced sharing of a scarce resource, the personal attack and political editorial rules are indistinguishable from the equal-time provision of § 315, a specific enactment of Congress requiring stations to set aside reply time under specified circumstances and to which the fairness doctrine and these constituent regulations are important complements. That provision, which has been part of the law since 1927, Radio Act of 1927, c. 169, § 18, 44 Stat. 1162, 1170, has been held valid by this Court as an obligation of the licensee relieving him of any power in anyway to prevent or censor the broadcast, and thus insulating him from liability for defamation. The constitutionality of the statute under the First Amendment was unquestioned.[17] Farmers Educ. & Coop. Union v. WDAY, 360 U. S. 525 (1959).

Nor can we say that it is inconsistent with the First Amendment goal of producing an informed public capable of conducting its own affairs to require a broadcaster to permit answers to personal attacks occurring in the course of discussing controversial issues, or to require that the political opponents of those endorsed by the station be given a chance to communicate with the public.[18] Otherwise, station owners and a few networks would have unfettered power to make time available only to the highest bidders, to communicate only their own views on public issues, people and candidates, and to permit on the air only those with whom they agreed. There is no sanctuary in the First Amendment for unlimited private censorship operating in a medium not open to all. "Freedom of the press from governmental interference under the First Amendment does not sanction repression of that freedom by private interests." Associated Press v. U. S., 326 U. S. 1, 20 (1944).

C.

It is strenuously argued, however, that if political editorials or personal attacks will trigger an obligation in broadcasters to afford the opportunity for expression to speakers who need not pay for time and whose views are unpalatable to the licensees, then broadcasters will be irresistibly forced to self-censorship and their coverage of controversial public issues will be eliminated or at least rendered wholly ineffective. Such a result would indeed be a serious matter, for should licensees actually eliminate their coverage of controversial issues, the purposes of the doctrine would be stifled.

At this point, however, as the Federal Communications Commission has indicated, that possibility is at best speculative. The communications industry, and in particular the networks, have taken pains to present controversial issues in the past, and even now they do not assert that they intend to abandon their efforts in this regard.[19] It would be better if the FCC's encouragement were never necessary to induce the broadcasters to meet their responsibility. And if experience with the administration of these doctrines indicates that they have the net effect of reducing rather than enhancing the volume and quality of coverage, there will be time enough to reconsider the constitutional implications. The fairness doctrine in the past has had no such overall effect.

That this will occur now seems unlikely, however, since if present licensees should suddenly prove timorous, the Commission is not powerless to insist that they give adequate and fair attention to public issues. It does not violate the First Amendment to treat licensees given the privilege of using scarce radio frequencies as proxies for the entire community, obligated to give suitable time and attention to matters of great public concern. To condition the granting or renewal of licenses on a willingness to present representative community views on controversial issues is consistent with the ends and purposes of those constitutional provisions forbidding the abridgment of freedom of speech and freedom of the press. Congress need not stand idly by and permit those with licenses to ignore the problems which beset the people or to exclude from the airways anything but their own views of fundamental questions. The statute, long administrative practice, and cases are to this effect.

[17] This has not prevented vigorous argument from developing on the constitutionality of the ancillary FCC doctrines. Compare Barrow, The Equal Opportunities and Fairness Doctrine in Broadcasting: Pillars in the Forum of Democracy, 37 U. Cin. L. Rev. 447 (1968), with Robinson, The FCC and the First Amendment: Observations on 40 Years of Radio and Television Regulation, 52 Minn. L. Rev. 67 (1967), and Sullivan, Editorials and Controversy: The Broadcaster's Dilemma, 32 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 719 (1964).

[18] The expression of views opposing those which broadcasters permit to be aired in the first place need not be confined solely to the broadcasters themselves as proxies. "Nor is it enough that he should hear the arguments of his adversaries from his own teachers, presented as they state them, and accompanied by what they offer as refutations. That is not the way to do justice to the arguments, or bring them into real contact with his own mind. He must be able to hear them from persons who actually believe them; who defend them in earnest, and do their very utmost for them." J. S. Mill, On Liberty 32 (R. McCallum ed. 1947).

[19] The President of the Columbia Broadcasting System has recently declared that despite the Government, "we are determined to continue covering controversial issues as a public service, and exercising our own independent news judgment and enterprise. I, for one, refuse to allow that judgment and enterprise to be affected by official intimidation." Stanton, Keynote Address, Sigma Delta Chi National Convention, Atlanta, Georgia, November 21, 1968. Problems of news coverage from the broadcaster's viewpoint are surveyed in Wood, Electronic Journalism (1967).

Licenses to broadcast do not confer ownership of designated frequencies, but only the temporary privilege of using them. 47 U.S.C. § 301. Unless renewed, they expire within three years. 47 U.S.C. § 307(d). The statute mandates the issuance of licenses of the "public convenience, interest, or necessity will be served thereby." 47 U.S.C. § 307(a). In applying this standard the Commission for 40 years has been choosing licensees based in part on their program proposals. In F.R.C. v. Nelson Bros. Bond and Mortgage Co., 289 U.S. 266, 279 (1933), the Court noted that in "view of the limited number of available broadcasting frequencies, the Congress has authorized allocation and licenses." In determining how best to allocate frequencies, the Federal Radio Commission considered the needs of competing communities and the programs offered by competing stations to meet the needs; moreover, if needs or programs shifted, the Commission could alter its allocations to reflect those shifts. Id., at 285. In the same vein, in F.C.C. v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 137–138 (1940), the Court noted that the statutory standards was a supple instrument to effect congressional desires "to maintain . . . a grip on the dynamic aspects of radio transmission" and to allay fears that "in the absence of governmental control the public interest might be subordinated to monopolistic domination in the broadcasting field." Three years later the Court considered the validity of the Commission's chain broadcasting regulations, which among other things forbade stations from devoting too much time to network programs in order that there be suitable opportunity for local programs serving local needs. The Court upheld the regulations, unequivocally recognizing that the Commission was more than a traffic policeman concerned with the technical aspects of broadcasting and that it neither exceeded its power under the statute nor transgressed the First Amendment in interesting itself in general program format and the kinds of programs broadcast by licensees. National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190 (1943).

The litigants embellish their first amendment arguments with the contention that the regulations are so vague that their duties are impossible to discern. Of this point it is enough to say that, judging the validity of the regulations on their face as they are presented here, we cannot conclude that the FCC has been left a free hand to vindicate its own idiosyncratic conception of the public interest or of the requirements of free-speech. Past adjudications by the FCC give added precision to the regulations; there was nothing vague about the FCC's specific ruling in Red Lion that Fred Cook should be provided an opportunity to reply. The regulations at issue in RTNDA could be employed in precisely the same way as the fairness doctrine was in Red Lion. Moreover, the FCC itself has recognized that the applicability of its regulations to situations beyond the scope of past cases may be questionable, 32 Fed. Reg. 10303, 10304 and n. 6, and will not impose sanctions in such cases without warning. We need not approve every aspect of the fairness doctrine to decide these cases, and we will not now pass upon the constitutionality of these regulations by envisioning the most extreme applications conceivable, United States v. Sullivan, 332 U.S. 689, 694 (1948), but will deal with those problems if and when they arise.

We need not and do not now ratify every past and future decision by the FCC with regard to programming. There is no question here of the Commission's refusal to permit the broadcaster to carry a particular program or to publish his own views; of a discriminatory refusal to require the licensee to broadcast certain views which have been denied access to the airways; of government censorship of a particular program contrary to § 326; or of the official government view dominating public broadcasting. Such questions would raise more serious first amendment issues. But we do hold that the Congress and the Commission do not violate the First Amendment when they require a radio or television station to give reply time to answer personal attacks and political editorials.

E.

It is argued that even if at one time the lack of available frequencies for all who wished to use them justified the Government's choice of those who would best serve the public interest by acting as proxy for those who would present differing views, or by giving the latter access directly to broadcast facilities, this condition no longer prevails so that continuing control is not justified. To this there are several answers.

Scarcity is not entirely a thing of the past. Advances in technology, such as microwave transmission, have led to more efficient utilization of the frequency spectrum, but uses for that spectrum have also grown apace.[20] Portions of the spectrum must be reserved for vital uses unconnected with human communication, such as radio-navigational aids used by aircraft and vessels. Conflicts have even emerged between such vital functions as defense preparedness and experimentation in methods of averting midair collisions through radio warning devices.[21] "Land mobile services" such as police, ambulance, fire department, public utility, and other communications systems have been occupying an increasingly crowded portion of the frequency spectrum[22] and there are, apart from licensed amateur radio operators' equipment, 5,000,000 transmitters operated on the "citizens' band" which is also increasingly congested.[23] Among the various uses for radio frequency space, including marine, aviation, amateur, military, and common carrier users, there are easily enough claimants to permit use of the whole with an even smaller allocation to broadcast radio and television uses than now exists.

Comparative hearings between competing applicants for broadcast spectrum space are by no means a thing of the past. The radio spectrum has become so congested that at times it has been necessary to suspend new applications.[24] The very high frequency television spectrum is, in the country's major markets, almost entirely occupied, although space reserved for ultra high frequency television transmission, which is a relatively recent development as a commercially viable alternative, has not yet been completely filled.[25]

The rapidity with which technological advances succeed one another to create more efficient use of spectrum space on the one hand, and to create new uses for that space by ever growing numbers of people on the other, make it unwise to speculate on the future allocation of that space. It is enough to say that the resource is one of considerable and growing importance whose scarcity impelled its regulation by an agency authorized by Congress. Nothing in this record, or in our own researches, convinces us that the resource is no longer one for which there are more immediate and potential uses than can be accommodated, and for which wise planning is essential.[26] This does not mean, of course, that every possible wavelength must be occupied at every hour by some vital use in order to sustain the congressional judgment. The substantial capital investment required for many uses, in addition to the potentiality for confusion and interference inherent in any scheme for continuous kaleidoscopic reallocation of all available space may make this unfeasible. The allocation need not be made at such a breakneck pace that the objectives of the allocation are themselves imperiled.[27]

[24] Kessler v. FCC, 326 F. 2d 673 (C. A. D. C. Cir. 1963).

[25] In a table prepared by the FCC on the basis of statistics current as of August 31, 1968, VHF and UHF channels allocated to and those available in the top 100 market areas for television are set forth:

Even where there are gaps in spectrum utilization, the fact remains that existing broadcasts have often attained their present position because of their initial government selection in competition with others before new technological advances opened new opportunities for further uses. Long experience in broadcasting, confirmed habits of listeners and viewers, network affiliation, and other advantages in program procurement give existing broadcasters a substantial advantage over new entrants, even where new entry is technologically possible. These advantages are the fruit of a preferred position conferred by the Government. Some present possibility for new entry by competing stations is not enough, in itself, to render unconstitutional the Government's effort to assure that a broadcaster's programming ranges widely enough to serve the public interest.

In view of the prevalence of scarcity of broadcast frequencies, the Government's role in allocating those frequencies, and the legitimate claims of those unable without governmental assistance to gain access to those frequencies for expression of their views, we hold the regulations and ruling at issue here are both authorized by statute and constitutional.[28] The judgment of the Court of Appeals in Red Lion is affirmed and that in RTNDA reversed and the causes remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Not having heard oral argument in these cases, Mr. Justice Douglas took no part in the Court's decision.

[26] RTNDA argues that these regulations should be held invalid for failure of the FCC to make specific findings in the rule-making proceeding relating to these factual questions. Presumably the fairness doctrine and the personal attack decisions themselves, such as Red Lion, should fall for the same reason. But this argument ignores the fact that these regulations are no more than the detailed specification of certain consequences of long-standing rules, the need for which was recognized by the Congress on the factual predicate of scarcity made plain in 1927, recognized by this Court in the 1943 National Broadcasting Co. case, and reaffirmed by the Congress as recently as 1959. "If the number of radio and television stations were not limited by available frequencies, the committee would have no hesitation in removing completely the present provision regarding equal time and urge the right of each broadcaster to follow his own conscience. . . . However, broadcast frequencies are limited and, therefore, they have been necessarily considered a public trust." S. Rep. No. 562, 86th Cong., 1st Sess., 8–9 (1959). In light of this history, the opportunity which the broadcasters have had to address the FCC and show that somehow the situation had radically changed, undercutting the validity of the congressional, and their failure to adduce any convincing evidence of that in the record here, we cannot consider the absence of more detailed findings below to be determinative.

[27] The "airwaves [need not] be filled at the earliest possible moment in all circumstances without due regard for these important factors." Community Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 274 F. 2d 753, 763 (C. A. D. C. Cir. 1960). Accord, enforcing the fairness doctrine, Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ v. FCC, 359 F. 2d 994, 1009 (C. A. D. C. Cir. 1966).

[28] We need not deal with the argument that even if there is no longer a technological scarcity of frequencies limiting the number of broadcasters, there nevertheless is an economic scarcity in the sense that the Commission could or does limit entry to the broadcasting market on economic grounds and license no more stations than the market will support. Hence, it is said, the fairness doctrine or its equivalent is essential to satisfy the claims of those excluded and of the public generally. A related argument, which we also put aside, is that quite apart from scarcity of frequencies, technological or economic, Congress does not abridge freedom of speech or press by legislation directly or indirectly multiplying the voices and views presented to the public through time sharing, fairness doctrines, or other devices which limit or dissipate the power of those who sit astride the channels of communication with the general public. OPINION OF THE COURT

Mr. Justice Douglas delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases are here on appeal[1] from a judgment of a three-judge District Court[2] holding that the defendants had violated § 1 and § 2 of the Sherman Act, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 50 Stat. 693, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2, and granting an injunction and other relief. 66 F. Supp. 323; 70 F. Supp. 53.

[1] Sec. 2 of the Expediting Act of February 11, 1903, 32 Stat. 823, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 29, and § 238 of the Judicial Code, as amended by the Act of February 13, 1925, 43 Stat. 936, 938, 28 U.S.C. § 345.

[2] The court was convened pursuant to [illegible] ions of the Act of April 6, 1942, 56 Stat. 198, 199, 15 U.S.C. § 28.

The suit was instituted by the United States under § 4 of the Sherman Act to prevent and restrain violations of it. The defendants fall into three groups: (1) Paramount Pictures, Inc., Loew's, Incorporated, Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation, Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc., Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, which produce motion pictures, and their respective subsidiaries or affiliates which distribute and exhibit films. These are known as the five major defendants or exhibitor-defendants. (2) Columbia Pictures Corporation and Universal Corporation, which produce motion pictures, and their subsidiaries which distribute films. (3) United Artists Corporation, which is engaged only in the distribution of motion pictures. The five majors, through their subsidiaries or affiliates, own or control theatres; the other defendants do not.

The complaint charged that the producer defendants had attempted to monopolize and had monopolized the production of motion pictures. The District Court found to the contrary and that finding is not challenged here. The complaint charged that all the defendants, as distributors, had conspired to restrain and monopolize and had restrained and monopolized interstate trade in the distribution and exhibition of films by specific practices which we will shortly relate It also charged that the five major defendants had engaged in a conspiracy to restrain and monopolize, and had restrained and monopolized, interstate trade in the exhibition of motion pictures in most of the larger cities of the country. It charged that the vertical combination of producing, distributing, and exhibiting motion pictures by each of the five major defendants volated § 1 and § 2 of the Act. It charged that each distributor-defendant had entered into various contracts with exhibitors which unreasonably restrained trade. Issue was joined; and a trial was had.[3]

First. Restraint of Trade—(1) Price Fixing

No film is sold to an exhibitor in the distribution of motion pictures. The right to exhibit under copyright is licensed. The District Court found that the defendants in the licenses they issued fixed minimum admission prices which the exhibitors agreed to charge, whether the rental of the film was a flat amount or a percentage of the receipts. It found that substantially uniform minimum prices had been established in the licenses of all defendants. Minimum prices were established in master agreements or franchises which were made between various defendants as distributors and various defendants as exhibitors and in joint operating agreements made by the five majors with each other and with independent theatre owners covering the operation of certain theatres.[4] By these later contracts minimum admission prices were often fixed for dozens of theatres owned by a particular defendant in a given area of the United States. Minimum prices were fixed in licenses of each of the five major defendants. The other three defendants made the same requirement in licenses granted to the exhibitor-defendants. We do not stop to elaborate on these findings. They are adequately detailed by the District Court in its opinion. See 66 F. Supp. 334–339.

The District Court found that two price-fixing conspiracies existed—a horizontal one between all the defendants; a vertical one between each distributor-defendant and its licensees. The latter was based on express agreements and was plainly established. The former was inferred from the pattern of price-fixing disclosed in the record. We think there was adequate foundation for it too. It is not necessary to find an express agreement in order to find a conspiracy. It is enough that a concert of action is contemplated and that the defendants conformed to the arrangement. Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U.S. 208, 226–227; United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U.S. 265, 275. That was shown here.

On this phase of the case the main attack is on the decree which enjoins the defendants and their affiliates from granting any license, except to their own theatres, in which minimum prices for admission to a theatre are fixed in any manner or by any means. The argument runs as follows: United States v. General Electric Co., 272 U.S. 476, held that an owner of a patent could, without violating the Sherman Act, grant a license to manufacture and vend, and could fix the price at which the licensee could sell the patented article. It is pointed out that defendants do not sell the films to exhibitors, but only license them and that the Copright Act (35 Stat. 1075, 1088. 17 U.S.C. § 1), like the patent statutes, grants the owner exclusive rights.[5] And it is argued that if the patentee can fix the price at which his licensee may sell the patented article, the owner of the copyright should be allowed the same privilege. It is maintained that such a privilege is essential to protect the value of the copyrighted films.

[3] Before trial, negotiations for a settlement were undertaken. As a result, a consent decree against the five major defendants was entered November 20, 1940. The consent decree contained no admission of violation of law and adjudicated no issue of fact or law, except that the complaint stated a cause of action. The decree reserved to the United States the right at the end of a three-year trial period to seek the relief prayed for in the amended complaint. After the end of the three-year period he United States moved for trial against all the defendants.

[4] A master agreement is a licensing agreement or "blanket deal" covering the exhibition of features in a number of theatres, usually comprising a circuit.

A franchise is a licensing agreement, or series of licensing agreements, entered into as part of the same transaction, in effect for more than one motion picture season and covering the exhibition of features released by one distributor during the entire period of the agreement.

An independent as used in these cases means a producer, distributor, or exhibitor, [illegible] the context requires, which is not a defendant in the action, or a subsidiary or [illegible] of a defendant.

We start, of course, from the premise that so far as the Sherman Act is concerned, a price-fixing combination is illegal per se. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150; United States v. Masonite Corporation, supra. We recently held in United States v. Gypsum Co., 333 U.S. 364, 400, that even patentees could not regiment an entire industry by licenses containing price-fixing agreements. What was said there is adequate to bar defendants, through their horizontal conspiracy, from fixing prices for the exhibition of films in the movie industry. Certainly the rights of the copyright owner are no greater than those of the patentee.

Nor can the result be different when we come to the vertical conspiracy between each distributor-defendant and his licensees. The District Court stated in its findings:

> "In agreeing to maintain a stipulated minimum admission price, each exhibitor thereby consents to the minimum price level at which it will compete against other licensees of the same distributor whether they exhibit on the same run or not. The total effect is that through the separate contracts between the distributor and its licensees a price structure is erected which regulates the licensees' ability to compete against one another in admission prices."

That consequence seems to us to be incontestable. We stated in United States v. Gypsum Co., supra, p. 401, that "The rewards which flow to the patentee and his licensees from the suppression of competition through the regulation of an industry are not reasonably and normally adapted to secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly." The same is true of the rewards of the copyright owners and their licensees in the present case. For here too the licenses are but a part of the general plan to suppress competition. The case where a distributor fixes admission prices to be charged by a single independent exhibitor, no other licensees or exhibitors being in contemplation, seems to be wholly academic, as the District Court pointed out. It is, therefore, plain that United States v. General Electric Co., supra, as applied in the patent cases, affords no haven to the defendants in this case. For a copyright may no more be used than a patent to deter competition between rivals in the exploitation of their licenses. See Interstate Circuit v. United States, supra, p. 230.

(2) Clearances and Runs

Clearances are designed to protect a particular run of a film against a subsequent run.[6] The District Court found that all of the distributor-defendants used clearance provisions and that they were stated in several different ways or in combinations: in terms of a given period between designated runs; in terms of admission prices charged by competing theatres; in terms of a given period of clearance over specifically named theatres; in terms of so many days' clearance over specified areas or towns; or in terms of clearances as fixed by other distributors.

The Department of Justice maintained below that clearances are unlawful per se under the Sherman Act. But that is a question we need not consider, for the District Court ruled otherwise and that conclusion is not challenged here. In its view their justification was found in the assurance they give the exhibitor that the distributor will not license a competitor to show the film either at the same time or so soon thereafter that the exhibitor's expected income from the run will be greatly diminished. A clearance when used to protect that interest of the exhibitor was reasonable, in the view of the court, when not unduly extended as to area or duration. Thus the court concluded that although clearances might indirectly affect admission prices, they do not fix them and that they may be reasonable restraints of trade under the Sherman Act.

[5] See note 12, infra.

[6] A clearance is the period of time, usually stipulated in license contracts, which must elapse between runs of the same feature within a particular area or in specified theatres.

Runs are successive exhibitions of a feature in a given area, first-run being the first exhibition in that area, second-run being the next subsequent, and so on, and include successive exhibitions in different theatres, even though such theatres may be under a common ownership or management.

The District Court held that in determining whether a clearance is unreasonable, the following factors are relevant:

(1) The admission prices of the theatres involved, as set by the exhibitors;

(2) The character and location of the theatres involved, including size, type of entertainment, appointments, transit facilities, etc.;

(3) The policy of operation of the theatres involved, such as the showing of double features, gift nights, give-aways, premiums, cut-rate tickets, lotteries, etc.;

(4) The rental terms and license fees paid by the theatres involved and the revenues derived by the distributor-defendant from such theatres;

(5) The extent to which the theatres involved compete with each other for patronage;

(6) The fact that a theatre involved is affiliated with a defendant-distributor or with an independent circuit of theatres should be disregarded; and

(7) There should be no clearance between theatres not in substantial competition.

It reviewed the evidence in light of these standards and concluded that many of the clearances granted by the defendants were unreasonable. We do not stop to retrace those steps. The evidence is ample to show, as the District Court plainly demonstrated, see 66 F. Supp. pp. 343–346, that many clearances had no relation to the competitive factors which alone could justify them.[7] The clearances which were in vogue had, indeed, acquired a fixed and uniform character and were made applicable to situations without regard to the special circumstances which are necessary to sustain them as reasonable restraints of trade. The evidence is ample to support the finding of the District Court that the defendants either participated in evolving this uniform system of clearances or acquiesced in it and so furthered its existence. That evidence, like the evidence on the price-fixing phase of the case, is therefore adequate to support the finding of a conspiracy to restrain trade by imposing unreasonable clearances.

The District Court enjoined defendants and their affiliates from agreeing with each other or with any exhibitors or distributors to maintain a system of clearances, or from granting any clearance between theatres not in substantial competition, or from granting or enforcing any clearance against theatres in substantial competition with the theatre receiving the license for exhibition in excess of what is reasonably necessary to protect the licensee in the run granted. In view of the findings this relief was plainly warranted.

Some of the defendants ask that this provision be construed (or, if necessary, modified) to allow licensors in granting clearances to take into consideration what is reasonably necessary for a fair return to the licensor. We reject that suggestion. If that were allowed, then the exhibitor-defendants would have an easy method of keeping alive at least some of the consequences of the effective conspiracy which they launched. For they could then justify clearances granted by other distributors in favor of their theatres in terms of the competitive requirements of those theatres, and at the same time justify the restrictions they impose upon independents in terms of the necessity of protecting their film rental as licensor. That is too potent a weapon to leave in the hands of those whose proclivity to unlawful conduct has been so marked. It plainly should not be allowed so long as the exhibitor-defendants own theatres. For in its baldest terms it is in the hands of the defendants no less than a power to restrict the competition of others in the way deemed most desirable by them. In the setting of this case the only measure of reasonableness of a clearance by Sherman Act standards is the special needs of the licensee for the competitive advantages it affords.

[7] Thus the District Court found:

"Some licenses granted clearance to sell to all theatres which the exhibitor party to the contract might thereafter own, lease, control, manage, or operate against all theatres in the immediate vicinity of the exhibitor's theatre thereafter erected or opened. The purpose of this type of clearance agreements was to fix the run and clearance status of any theatre thereafter opened not on the basis of its appointments, size, location, and other competitive features normally entering into such determination, but rather upon the sole basis of whether it were operated by the exhibitor party to the agreement."

Whether the same restrictions would be applicable to a producer who had not been a party to such a conspiracy is a question we do not reach.

Objection is made to a further provision of this part of the decree stating that "Whenever any clearance provision is attacked as not legal under the provisions of this decree, the burden shall be upon the distributor to sustain the legality thereof." We think that provision was justified. Clearances have been used along with price fixing to suppress competition with the theatres of the exhibitor-defendants and with other favored exhibitors. The District Court could therefore have eliminated clearances completely for a substantial period of time, even though, as it thought, they were not illegal per se. For equity has the power to uproot all parts of an illegal scheme—the valid as well as the invalid—in order to rid the trade or commerce of all taint of the conspiracy. United States v. Bausch & Lomb Co., 321 U.S. 707, 724. The court certainly then could take the lesser step of making them prima facie invalid. But we do not rest on that alone. As we have said, the only justification for clearances in the setting of this case is in terms of the special needs of the licensee for the competitive advantages they afford. To place on the distributor the burden of showing their reasonableness is to place it on the one party in the best position to evaluate their competitive effects. Those who have shown such a marked proclivity for unlawful conduct are in no position to complain that they carry the burden of showing that their future clearances come within the law. Cf. United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., 323 U.S. 173, 188.

(3) Pooling Agreements; Joint Ownership

The District Court found the exhibitor-defendants had agreements with each other and their affiliates by which theatres of two or more of them, normally competitive, were operated as a unit, or managed by a joint committee or by one of the exhibitors, the profits being shared according to prearranged percentages. Some of these agreements provided that the parties might not acquire other competitive theatres without first offering them for inclusion in the pool. The court concluded that the result of these agreements was to eliminate competition pro tanto both in exhibition and in distribution of features,[8] since the parties would naturally direct the films to the theatres in whose earnings they were interested.

The District Court also found that the exhibitor-defendants had like agreements with certain independent exhibitors. Those alliances had, in its view, the effect of nullifying competition between the allied theatres and of making more effective the competition of the group against theatres not members of the pool. The court found that in some cases the operating agreements were achieved through leases of theatres, the rentals being measured by a percentage of profits earned by the theatres in the pool. The District Court required the dissolution of existing pooling agreements and enjoined any future arrangement of that character.

These provisions of the decree will stand. The practices were bald efforts to substitute monopoly for competition and to strengthen the hold of the exhibitor-defendants on the industry by alignment of competitors on their side. Clearer restraints of trade are difficult to imagine.

There was another type of business arrangement that the District Court found to have the same effect as the pooling agreements just mentioned. Many theatres are owned jointly by two or more exhibitor-defendants or by an exhibitor-defendant and an independent.[9] The result is, according to the District Court, that the theatres are operated "collectively, rather than competitively." And where the joint owners are an exhibitor-defendant and an independent the effect is, according to the District Court, the elimination by the exhibitor-defendant of "putative competition between itself and the other joint owner, who otherwise would be in a position to operate theatres independently." The District Court found these joint ownerships of theatres to be unreasonable restraints of trade within the meaning of the Sherman Act.

The District Court ordered the exhibitor-defendants to disaffiliate by terminating their joint ownership of theatres; and it enjoined future acquisitions of such interests. One is authorized to buy out the other if it shows to the satisfaction of the District Court and that court first finds that such acquisition "will not unduly restrain competition in the exhibition of feature motion pictures. This dissolution and prohibition of joint ownership as between exhibitor-defendants was plainly warranted. To the extent that they have joint interests in the outlets for their films each in practical effect grants the other a priority for the exhibition of its films. For in this situation, as in the case where theatres are jointly managed, the natural gravitation of films is to the theatres in whose earnings the distributors have an interest. Joint ownership between exhibitor-defendants then becomes a device for strengthening their competitive position as exhibitors by forming an alliance as distributors. An express agreement to grant each other the preference would be a most effective weapon to stifle competition. A working arrangement or business device that has that necessary consequence gathers no immunity because of its subtlety. Each is a restraint of trade condemned by the Sherman Act.

The District Court also ordered disaffiliation in those instances where theatres were jointly owned by an exhibitor-defendant and an independent, and where the interest of the exhibitor-defendant was "greater than five per cent unless such interest shall be ninety-five per cent or more," an independent being defined for this part of the decree as "any former, present or putative motion picture theatre operator which is not owned or controlled by the defendant holding the interest in question." The exhibitor-defendants are authorized to acquire existing interests of the independents in these theatres if they establish, and if the District Court first finds, that the acquisition "will not unduly restrain competition in the exhibition of feature motion pictures." All other acquisitions of such joint interests were enjoined.

This phase of the decree is strenuously attacked. We are asked to eliminate it for lack of findings to support it. The argument is that the findings show no more than the existence of joint ownership of theatres by exhibitor-defendants and independents. The statement by the District Court that the joint ownership eliminates "putative competition" is said to be a mere conclusion without evidentiary support. For it is said that the facts of the record show that many of the instances of joint ownership with an independent interest are cases wholly devoid of any history of or relationship to restraints of trade or monopolistic practices. Some are said to be rather fortuitous results of bankruptcies; others are said to be the results of investments by outside interests who have no desire or capacity to operate theatres, and so on.

It is conceded that the District Court made no inquiry into the circumstances under which a particular interest had been acquired. It treated all relationships alike, insofar as the disaffiliation provision of the decree is concerned. In this we think it erred.

We have gone into the record far enough to be confident that at least some of these acquisitions by the exhibitor-defendants were the products of the unlawful practices which the defendants have inflicted on the industry. To the extent that these acquisitions were the fruits of monopolistic practices or restraints of trade, they should be divested. And no permission to buy out the other owner should be given a defendant. United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, p. 189; Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, ante, p. 110. Moreover, even if lawfully acquired, they may have been utilized as part of the conspiracy to eliminate or suppress competition in furtherance of the ends of the conspiracy. In that event divestiture would likewise be justified. United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, pp. 189–190. In that situation permission to acquire the interest of the independent would have the unlawful effect of permitting the defendants to complete their plan to eliminate him.

Of the 1287 jointly owned with independents, 209 would not be affected by the decree since one of the ownership interests is less than 5 percent, an amount which the District Court treated as de minimis.

Furthermore, if the joint ownership is an alliance with one who is or would be an operator but for the joint ownership, divorce should be decreed even though the affiliation was innocently acquired. For that joint ownership would afford opportunity to perpetuate the effects of the restraints of trade which the exhibitor-defendants have inflicted on the industry.

It seems, however, that some of the cases of joint ownership do not fall into any of the categories we have listed. Some apparently involve no more than innocent investments by those who are not actual or potential operators. If in such cases the acquisition was not improperly used in furtherance of the conspiracy, its retention by defendants would be justified absent a finding that no monopoly resulted. And in those instances permission might be given the defendants to acquire the interests of the independents on a showing by them and a finding by the court that neither monopoly nor unreasonable restraint of trade in the exhibition of films would result. In short, we see no reason to place a ban on this type of ownership, at least so long as theatre ownership by the five majors is not prohibited. The results of inquiry along the lines we have indicated must await further findings of the District Court on remand of the cause.

(4) Formula Deals, Master Agreements, and Franchises

A formula deal is a licensing agreement with a circuit of theatres in which the license fee of a given feature is measured, for the theatres covered by the agreement, by a specified percentage of the feature's national gross. The District Court found that Paramount and RKO had made formula deals with independent and affiliated circuits. The circuit was allowed to allocate playing time and film rentals among the various theatres as it saw fit. The inclusion of theatres of a circuit into a single agreement gives no opportunity for other theatre owners to bid for the feature in their respective areas and, in the view of the District Court, is therefore an unreasonable restraint of trade. The District Court found some master agreements[10] open to the same objection. Those are the master agreements that cover exhibition in two or more theatres in a particular circuit and allow the exhibitor to allocate the film rental paid among the theatres as it sees fit and to exhibit the features upon such playing time as it deems best, and leaves other terms to the discretion of the circuit. The District Court enjoined the making or further performance of any formula deal of the type described above. It also enjoined the making or further performance of any master agreement covering the exhibition of features in a number of theatres.

The findings of the District Court in these respects are supported by facts, its conclusion that the formula deals and master agreements constitute restraint of trade is valid, and the relief is proper. The formula deals and master agreements are unlawful restraints of trade in two respects. In that way they eliminate the possibility of bidding for films theatre by theatre. In that way they eliminate the opportunity for the small competitor to obtain the choice first runs, and put a premium on the size of the circuit. They are, therefore, devices for stifling competition and diverting the cream of the business to the large operators. In the second place, the pooling of the purchasing power of an entire circuit in bidding for films is a misuse of monopoly power insofar as it combines the theatres in closed towns with competitive situations. The reasons have been stated in United States v. Griffith, ante, p. 100, and Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, ante, p. 110, and need not be repeated here. It is hardly necessary to add that distributors who join in such arrangements by exhibitors are active participants in effectuating a restraint of trade and a monopolistic practice. See United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, p. 183.

The District Court also enjoined the making or further performance of any franchise. A franchise is a contract with an exhibitor which extends over a period of more than a motion picture season and covers the exhibition of features released by the distributor during the period of the agreement. The District Court held that a franchise constituted a restraint of trade because a period of more than one season was too long and the inclusion of all features was disadvantageous to competitors. At least that is the way we read its findings.

Universal and United Artists object to the outlawry of franchise agreements. Universal points out that the charge of illegality of franchises in these cases was restricted to franchises with theatres owned by the major defendants and to franchises with circuits or theatres in a circuit, a circuit being defined in the complaint as a group of more than five theatres controlled by the same person or a group of more than five theatres which combine through a common agent in licensing films. It seems, therefore, that the legality of franchises to other exhibitors (except as to block-booking, a practice to which we will later advert) was not in issue in the litigation. Moreover, the findings on franchises are clouded by the statement of the District Court in the opinion that franchises "necessarily contravene the plan of licensing each picture, theatre by theatre, to the highest bidder." As will be seen hereafter, we eliminate from the decree the provision for competitive bidding. But for its inclusion of competitive bidding the District Court might well have treated the problem of franchises differently.

[10] See note 4, supra.

We can see how if franchises were allowed to be used between the exhibitor-defendants each might be able to strengthen its strategic position in the exhibition field and continue the ill effects of the conspiracy which the decree is designed to dissipate. Franchise agreements may have been employed as devices to discriminate against some independants in favor of others. We know from the record that franchise agreements often contained discriminatory clauses operating in favor not only of theatres owned by the defendants but also of the large circuits. But we cannot say on this record that franchises are illegal per se when extended to any theatre or circuit no matter how small. The findings do not deal with the issue doubtlessly due to the fact that any system of franchises would necessarily conflict with the system of competitive bidding adopted by the District Court. Hence we set aside the findings on franchises so that the court may examine the problem in the light of the elimination from the decree of competitive bidding.

We do not take that course in the case of formula deals and master agreements, for the findings in these instances seem to stand on their own bottom and apparently have no necessary dependency on the provision for competitive bidding.

(5) Block-Booking

Block-booking is the practice of licensing, or offering for license, one feature or group of features on condition that the exhibitor will also license another feature or group of features released by the distributors during a given period. The films are licensed in blocks before they are actually produced. All the defendants, except United Artists, have engaged in the practice. Block-booking prevents competitors from bidding for single features on their individual merits. The District Court held it illegal for that reason and for the reason that it "adds to the monopoly of a single copyrighted picture that of another copyrighted picture which must be taken and exhibited in order to secure the first." That enlargement of the monopoly of the copyright was condemned below in reliance on the principle which forbids the owner of a patent to condition its use on the purchase or use of patented or unpatented materials. See Ethyl Gasoline Corporation v. United States, 309 U.S. 436, 459; Morton Salt Co. v. Suppiger Co., 314 U.S. 488, 491: Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Investment Co., 320 U.S. 661, 665. The court enjoined defendants from performing or entering into any license in which the right to exhibit one feature is conditioned upon the licensee's taking one or more other features.[11]

We approve that restriction. The copyright law, like the patent statutes, makes reward to the owner a secondary consideration. In Fox Film Corp. v. Doyal, 286 U.S. 123, 127, Chief Justice Hughes spoke as follows respecting the copyright monopoly granted by Congress, "The sole interest of the United States and the primary object in conferring the monopoly lie in the general benefits derived by the public from the labors of authors." It is said that reward to the author or artist serves to induce release to the public of the products of his creative genius. But the reward does not serve its public purpose if it is not related to the quality of the copyright. Where a high quality film greatly desired is licensed only if an inferior one is taken, the latter borrows quality from the former and strengthens its monopoly by drawing on the other. The practice tends to equalize rather than differentiate the reward for the individual copyrights. Even where all the films included in the package are of equal quality, the requirement that all be taken if one is desired increases the market for some. Each stands not on its own footing but in whole or in part on the appeal which another film may have. As the District Court said, the result is to add to the monopoly of the copyright in violation of the principle of the patent cases involving tying clauses.[12]

[11] Blind-selling is a practice whereby a distributor licenses a feature before the exhibitor is afforded an opportunity to view it. To remedy the problems created by that practice the District Court included the following provision in its decree:

"To the extent that any of the features have not been trade shown prior to the granting of the license for more than a single feature, the licensee shall be given by the licensor the right to reject twenty per cent of such features not trade shown prior to the granting of the license, such right of rejection to be exercised in the order of release within ten days after there has been an opportunity afforded to the licensee to inspect the feature."

The court advanced the following as its reason for inclusion of this provision:

"Blind-selling does not appear to be as inherently restrictive of competition as block-booking, although it is capable of some abuse. By this practice a distributor could promise a picture of good quality or of a certain type which when produced might prove to be of poor quality or of another type—a competing distributor meanwhile being unable to market its product and in the end losing its outlets for future pictures. The evidence indicates that trade-shows, which are designed to prevent such blind-selling, are poorly attended by exhibitors. Accordingly, exhibitors who choose to obtain their films for exhibition in quantities, need to be protected against burdensome agreements by being given an option to reject a certain percentage of their blind-licensed pictures within a reasonable time after they shall have become available for inspection."

We approve this provision of the decree.

It is argued that Transparent-Wrap Machine Corp. v. Stokes & Smith Co., 329 U.S. 637, points to a contrary result. That case held that the inclusion in a patent license of a condition requiring the licensee to assign improvement patents was not per se illegal. But that decision, confined to improvement patents, was greatly influenced by the federal statute governing assignments of patents. It therefore has no controlling significance here.

Columbia Pictures makes an earnest argument that enforcement of the restriction as to block-booking will be very disadvantageous to it and will greatly impair its ability to operate profitably. But the policy of the antitrust laws is not qualified or conditioned by the convenience of those whose conduct is regulated. Nor can a vested interest in a practice which contravenes the policy of the antitrust laws receive judicial sanction.

We do not suggest that films may not be sold in blocks or groups, when there is no requirement, express or implied, for the purchase of more than one film. All we hold to be illegal is a refusal to license one or more copyrights unless another copyright is accepted.

(6) Discrimination

The District Court found that defendants had discriminated against small independent exhibitors and in favor of large affiliated and unaffiliated circuits through various kinds of contract provisions. These included suspension of the terms of a contract if a circuit theatre remained closed for more than eight weeks with reinstatement without liability on reopening; allowing large privileges in the selection and elimination of films; allowing deductions in film rentals if double bills are played; granting moveovers[12] and extended runs; granting road show privileges;[14] allowing overage and underage;[15] granting unlimited playing time; excluding foreign pictures and those of independent producers; and granting rights to question the classification of features for rental purposes. The District Court found that the competitive advantages of these provisions were so great that their inclusion in contracts with the larger circuis and their exclusion from contracts with the small independents constituted an unreasonable discrimination against the latter. Each discriminatory contract constituted a conspiracy between licensor and licensee. Hence the District Court deemed it unnecessary to decide whether the defendants had conspired among themselves to make these discriminations. No provision of the decree specifically enjoins these discriminatory practices because they were thought to be impossible under the system of competitive bidding adopted by the District Court.

[12] The exclusive right granted by the Copyright Act, 35 Stat. 1075, 17 U.S.C. § 1, includes no such privilege. It provides, so far as material here, as follows:

"That any person entitled thereto, upon complying with the provisions of this Act, shall have the exclusive right:

"(d) To perform or represent the copyrighted work publicly if it be a drama or, if it be a dramatic work and not reproduced in copies for sale, to vend any manuscript or any record whatsoever thereof; to make or to procure the making of any transcription or record thereof by or from which, in whole or in part, it may in any manner or by any method be exhibited, performed, represented, produced, or reproduced; and to exhibit perform, represent, produce, or reproduce it in any manner or by any method whatsoever;"

[13] A moreover is the privilege given a licensee to move a picture from one theatre to another as a continuation of the run at the licensee's first theatre.

[14] A road show is a public exhibition of a feature in a limited number of theatres, in advance of its general release, at admission prices higher than those customarily charged in first-run theatres in those areas.

[15] Underage and overage refer to the practice of using excess film rental earned in one circuit theatre to fulfill a rental commitment defaulted by another.

These findings are amply supported by the evidence. We concur in the conclusion that these discriminatory practices are included among the restraints of trade which the Sherman Act condemns. See Instate Circuit v. United States, supra, p. 231; United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, pp. 182–183. It will be for the District Court on remand of these cases to provide effective relief against their continuance, as our elimination of the provision for competitive bidding leaves this phase of the cases unguarded.

There is some suggestion on this as well as on other phases of the cases that large exhibitors with whom defendants dealt fathered the illegal practices and forced them onto the defendants. But as the District Court observed, that circumstance if true does not help the defendants. For acquiescence in an illegal scheme is as much a violation of the Sherman Act as the creation and promotion of one.

Second—Competitive Bidding

The District Court concluded that the only way competition could be introduced into the existing system of fixed prices, clearances and runs was to require that films be licensed on a competitive bidding basis. Films are to be offered to all exhibitors in each competitive area.[16] The license for the desired run is to be granted to the highest responsible bidder, unless the distributor rejects all offers. The licenses are to be offered and taken theatre by theatre and picture by picture. Licenses to show films in theatres in which the licensor owns directly or indirectly an interest of ninety-five per cent or more are excluded from the requirement for competitive bidding.

Paramount is the only one of the five majors who opposes the competitive bidding system. Columbia Pictures, Universal, and United Artists oppose it. And the Department of Justice, which apparently proposed the system originally, speaks strongly against it here.

At first blush there is much to commend the system of competitive bidding. The trade victims of this conspiracy have in large measure been the small independent operators. They are the ones that have felt most keenly the discriminatory practices and predatory activities in which defendants have freely indulged. They have been the victims of the massed purchasing power of the larger units in the industry. It is largely out of the ruins of the small operators that the large empires of exhibitors have been built. Thus it would appear to be a great boon to them to substitute open bidding for the private deals and favors on which the large operators have thrived. But after reflection we have concluded that competitive bidding involves the judiciary so deeply in the daily operation of this nation-wide business and promises such dubious benefits that it should not be undertaken.

Each film is to be licensed on a particular run to "the highest responsible bidder, having a theatre of a size, location and equipment adequate to yield a reasonable return to the licensor." The bid "shall state what run such exhibitor desires and what he is willing to pay for such feature, which statement may specify a flat rental, or a percentage of gross receipts, or both, or any other form of rental, and shall also specify what clearance such exhibitor is willing to accept, the time and days when such exhibitor desires to exhibit it, and any other offers which such exhibitor may care to make." We do not doubt that if a competitive bidding system is adopted all these provisions are necessary. For the licensing of films at auction is quite obviously a more complicated matter than the like sales for cash or tobacco, wheat, or other produce. Columbia puts these pertinent queries: "No two exhibitors are likely to make the same bids as to dates, clearance, method of fixing rental, etc. May bids containing such diverse factors be readily compared? May a flat rental bid be compared with a percentage bid? May the value of any percentage bid be determined unless the admission price is fixed by the license?"

The question as to who is the highest bidder involves the use of standards incapable of precise definition because the bids being compared contain different ingredients. Determining who is the most responsible bidder likewise cannot be reduced to a formula. The distributor's judgment of the character and integrity of a particular exhibitor might result in acceptance of a lower bid than others offered. Yet to prove that favoritism was shown would be well-nigh impossible, unless perhaps all the exhibitors in the country were given classifications of sponsibility. If, indeed, the choice between bidders is not to be entrusted to the uncontrolled discretion of the distributors, some effort to standardize the factors involved in determining "a reasonable return to the licensor" would seem necessary.

[16] Competitive bidding is required only in a "competitive area" where it is exhibitors." As the District Court said, "the decree provides an opportu exhibitor in a competitive area who may desire to do so."

The details of the competitive bidding system will be found in 70 F.

We mention these matters merely to indicate the character of the job of supervising such a competitive bidding system. It would involve the judiciary in the administration of intricate and detailed rules governing priorty, perod of clearance, length of run, competitive areas, reasonable return, and the like. The system would be apt to require as close a supervision as a continuous receivership, unless the defendants were to be entrusted with vast discretion. The judiciary is unsuited to affairs of business management; and control through the power of contempt is crude and clumsy and lacking in the flexibility necessary to make continuous and detailed supervision effective. Yet delegation of the management of the system to the discretion of those who had the genius to conceive the present conspiracy and to execute it with the subtlety which this record reveals, could be done only with the greatest reluctance. At least such choices should not be faced unless the need for the system is great and its benefits plain.

The system uproots business arrangements and established relationships with no apparent overall benefit to the small independent exhibitor. If each feature must go to the highest responsible bidder, those with the greatest purchasing power would seem to be in a favored position. Those with the longest purse—the exhibitor-defendants and the large circuits—would seem to stand in a preferred position. If in fact they were enabled through the competitive bidding system to take the cream of the business, eliminate the smaller independents, and thus increase their own strategic hold on the industry, they would have the cloak of the court's decree around them for protection. Hence the natural advantage which the larger and financially stronger exhibitors would seem to have in the bidding gives us pause. If a premium is placed on purchasing power, the court-created system may be a powerful factor toward increasing the concentration of economic power in the industry rather than cleansing the competitive system of unwholesome practices. For where the system in operation promises the advantage to the exhibitor who is in the strongest financial position, the injunction against discrimination[17] is apt to hold an empty promise. In this connection it should be noted that, even though the independents in a given competitive area do not want competitive bidding, the exhibitor-defendants can invoke the system.

Our doubts concerning the competitive bidding system are increased by the fact that defendants who own theatres are allowed to pre-empt their own features. They thus start with an inventory which all other exhibitors lack. The latter have no prospect of assured runs except what they get by competitive bidding. The proposed system does not offset in any way the advantages which the exhibitor-defendants have by way of theatre ownership. It would seem in fact to increase them. For the independents are deprived of the stability which flows from established business relationships. Under the proposed system they can get features only if they are the highest responsible bidder. They can no longer depend on their private sources of supply which their ingenuity has created. Those sources, built perhaps on private relationships and representing important items of good will, are banned, even though they are free of any taint of illegality.

The system was designed, as some of the defendants put it, to remedy the difficulty of any theatre to break into or change the existing system of runs and clearances. But we do not see how, in practical operation, the proposed system of competitive bidding is likely to open up to competition the markets which defendants' unlawful restraints have dominated. Rather real danger seems to us to lie in the opportunities the system affords the exhibitor-defendants and the other large operators to strengthen their hold in the industry. We are reluctant to alter decrees in these cases where there is agreement with the District Court on the nature of the violations. United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, p. 185; International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U.S. 392, 400. But the provisions for competitive bidding in these cases promise little in the way of relief against the real evils of the conspiracy. They implicate the judiciary heavily in the details of business management if supervision is to be effective. They vest powerful control in the exhibitor-defendants over their competitors if close supervision by the court is not undertaken. In light of these considerations we conclude that the competitive bidding provisions of the decree should be eliminated so that a more effective decree may be fashioned.

[17] The competitive bidding part of the decree provides: "Each license shall be granted upon the merits and without discrimination in favor of affiliates, old customers or others."

We have already indicated in preceding parts of this opinion that this alteration in the decree leaves a hiatus or two which will have to be filled on remand of the cases. We will indicate hereafter another phase of the problem which the District Court should also consider in view of this alteration in the decree. But out of an abundance of caution we add this additional word. The competitive bidding system was perhaps the central arch of the decree designed by the District Court. Its elimination may affect the cases in ways other than those which we expressly mention. Hence on remand of the cases the freedom of the District Court to reconsider the adequacy of decree is not limited to those parts we have specifically indicated.

Third. Monopoly, Expansion of Theatre Holdings, Divestiture

There is a suggestion that the hold the defendants have on the industry is so great that a problem under the First Amendment is raised, Cf. Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1. We have no doubt that moving pictures, like newspapers and radio, are included in the press whose freedom is guaranteed by the First Amendment. That issue would be focused here if we had any question concerning monopoly in the production of moving pictures. But monopoly in production was eliminated as an issue in these cases, as we have noted. The chief argument at the bar is phrased in terms of monopoly of exhibition, restraints on exhibition, and the like. Actually, the issue is even narrower than that. The main contest is over the cream of the exhibition business—that of the first-run theatres. By defining the issue so narrowly we do not intend to belittle its importance. It shows, however, that the question here is not what the public will see or if the public will be permitted to see certain features. It is clear that under the existing system the public will be denied access to none. If the public cannot see the features on the first-run, it may do so on the second, third, fourth, or later run. The central problem presented by these cases is which exhibitors get the highly profitable first-run business. That problem has important aspects under the Sherman Act. But it bears only remotely, if at all, on any question of freedom of the press, save only as timeliness of release may be a factor of importance in specific situations.

The controversy over monopoly relates to monopoly in exhibition and more particularly monopoly in the first-run phase of the exhibition business.

The five majors in 1945 had interests in somewhat over 17 per cent of the theatres in the United States—3,137 out of 18,076.[18] Those theatres paid 45 per cent of the total domestic film rental received by all eight defendants.

In the 92 cities of the country with populations over 100,000 at least 70 per cent of all the first-run theatres are affiliated with one or more of the five majors. In 4 of those cities the five majors have no theatres. In 38 of those cities there are no independent first-run theatres. In none of the remaining 50 cities did less than three of the distributor-defendants license their product on first run to theatres of the five majors. In 19 of the 50 cities less than three of the distributor-defendants licensed their product on first run to independent theatres. In a majority of the 50 cities the greater share of all the features of defendants were licensed for first-run exhibition in the theatres of the five majors.

In about 60 per cent of the 92 cities having populations of over 100,000, independent theatres compete with those of the five majors in first-run exhibition. In about 91 per cent of the 92 cities there is competition between independent theatres and the theatres of the five majors or between theatres of the five majors themselves for first-run exhibition. In all of the 92 cities there is always competition in some run even where there is no competition in first runs.

In cities between 25,000 and 100,000 populations the five majors have interests in 577 of a total of 978 first-run theatres or about 60 per cent. In about 300 additional towns, mostly under 25,000, an operator affiliated with one of the five majors has all of the theatres in the town.

[18] The theatres which each of the five majors owned independently of the others were: Paramount 1,395 or 7.72 per cent; Warner 501 or 2.77 per cent; Loew's 135 or .74 per cent; Fox 636 or 3.52 per cent; RKO 109 or .60 per cent. There were in addition 361 theatres or about 2 per cent in which two or more of the five majors had joint interests. These figures exclude connections through film-buying or management contracts or through corporations in which a defendant owns an indirect minority stock interest.

These theatres are located in 922 towns in 48 States and the District of Columbia. For further description of the distribution of theatres see Bertrand, Evans, and Blanchard, The Motion Picture Industry—A Pattern of Control 15–16 (TNEC Monograph 43, 1941).

The District Court held that the five majors could not be treated collectively so as to establish claims of general monopolization in exhibition. It found that none of them was organized or had been maintained "for the purpose of achieving a national monopoly" in exhibition. It found that the five majors by their present theatre holdings "alone" (which aggregate a little more than one-sixth of all the theatres in the United States), "do not and cannot collectively or individually, have a monopoly of exhibition." The District Court also found that where a single defendant owns all of the first-run theatres in a town, there is no sufficient proof that the acquisition was for the purpose of creating a monopoly. It found rather that such consequence resulted from the inertness of competitors, their lack of financial ability to build theatres comparable to those of the five majors, or the preference of the public for the best-equipped theatres. And the percentage of features on the market which any of the five majors could play in its own theatres was found to be relatively small and in nowise to approximate a monopoly of film exhibition.[19]

Even in respect of the theatres jointly owned or jointly operated by the deendants with each other or with independents, the District Court found no monopoly or attempt to monopolize. Those joint agreements or ownership were ound only to be unreasonable restraints of trade. The District Court, indeed, ound no monopoly on any phase of the cases, although it did find an attempt to monopolize in the fixing of prices, the granting of unreasonable clearances, blockooking and the other unlawful restraints of trade we have already discussed. The "root of the difficulties," according to the District Court, lay not in theatre ownership but in those unlawful practices.

The District Court did, however, enjoin the five majors from expanding their present theatre holdings in any manner.[20] It refused to grant the request of the Department of Justice for total divestiture by the five majors of their theatre holdings. It found that total divestiure would be injurious to the five majors and amaging to the public. Its thought on the latter score was that the new set of heatre owners who would take the place of the five majors would be unlikely for some years to give the public as good service as those they supplanted "in view f the latter's demonstrated experience and skill in operating what must be rearded as in general the largest and best equipped theatres." Divestiture was, it hought, too harsh a remedy where there was available the alternative of cometitive bidding. It accordingly concluded that divestiture was unnecessary "at ast until the efficiency of that system has been tried and found wanting."

It is clear, so far as the five majors are concerned, that the aim of the conpiracy was exclusionary, i.e. it was designed to strengthen their hold on the xhibition field. In other words, the conspiracy had monopoly in exhibition for ne of its goals, as the District Court held. Price, clearance, and run are interdependent. The clearance and run provisions of the licenses fixed the relative playing positions of all theatres in a certain area; the minimum price provisions were based on playing position—the first-run theatres being required to charge the highest prices, the second-run theatres the next highest, and so on. As the District Court found, "In effect, the distributor, by the fixing of minimum admission prices, attempts to give the prior-run exhibitors as near a monopoly of the patronage as possible."

[20] Excepted from this prohibition was the acquisition of interests in theatres jointly wned, a matter we have discussed in a preceding portion of this opinion.

It is, therefore, not enough in determining the need for divestiture to conclude with the District Court that none of the defendants was organized or has been maintained for the purpose of achieving a "national monopoly," nor that the five majors through their present theatre holdings "alone" do not and cannot collectively or individually have a monopoly of exhibition. For when the starting point is a conspiracy to effect a monopoly through restraints of trade, it is relevant to determine what the results of the conspiracy were even if they fell short of monopoly.

An example will illustrate the problem. In the popular sense there is a monopoly if one person owns the only theatre in town. That usually does not, however, constitute a violation of the Sherman Act. But as we noted in United States v. Griffith, ante, p. 100, and see Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, ante, p. 110, even such an ownership is vulnerable in a suit by the United States under the Sherman Act if the property was acquired, or its strategic position maintained, as a result of practices which constitute unreasonable restraints of trade. Otherwise, there would be reward from the conspiracy through retention of its fruits. Hence the problem of the District Court does not end with enjoining continuance of the unlawful restraints nor with dissolving the combination which launched the conspiracy. Its function includes undoing what the conspiracy achieved. As we have discussed in Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, ante, p. 110, the requirement that the defendants restore what they unlawfully obtained is no more punishment than the familiar remedy of restitution. What findings would be warranted after such an inquiry in the present cases, we do not know. For the findings of the District Court do not cover this point beyond stating that monopoly was an objective of the several restraints of trade that stand condemned.

Moreover, the problem under the Sherman Act is not solved merely by measuring monopoly in terms of size or extent of holdings or by concluding that single ownerships were not obtained "for the purpose of achieving a national monopoly." It is the relationship of the unreasonable restraints of trade to the position of the defendants in the exhibition field (and more particularly in the first-run phase of that business) that is of first importance on the divestiture phase of these cases. That is the position we have taken in Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, ante, p. 110, in dealing with a projection of the same conspiracy through certain large circuits. Parity of treatment of the unaffiliated and the affiliated circuits requires the same approach here. For the fruits of the conspiracy which are denied the independents must also be denied the five majors. In this connection there is a suggestion that one result of the conspiracy was a geographical division of territory among the five majors. We mention it not to intimate that it is true but only to indicate the appropriate extent of the inquiry concerning the effect of the conspiracy in theatre ownership by the five majors.

The findings of the District Court are deficient on that score and obscure on another. The District Court in its findings speaks of the absence of a "purpose" on the part of any of the five majors to achieve a "national monopoly" in the exhibition of motion pictures. First, there is no finding as to the presence or absence of monopoly on the part of the five majors in the first-run field for the entire country, in the first-run field in the 92 largest cities of the country, or in the first-run field in separate localities. Yet the first-run field, which constitutes the cream of the exhibition business, is the core of the present cases. Section 1 of the Sherman Act outlaws unreasonable restraints irrespective of the amount of trade or commerce involved (United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 224, 225, n. 59), and § 2 condemns monopoly of "any part" of trade or commerce. "Any part" is construed to mean an appreciable part of interstate or foreign trade or commerce. United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U.S. 218, 225. Second, we pointed out in United States v. Griffith, ante, p. 100, that "specific intent" is not necessary to establish a "purpose or intent" to create a monopoly but that the requisite "purpose or intent" is present if monopoly results as a necessary consequence of what was done. The findings of the District Court on this phase of the cases are not clear, though we take them to mean by the absence of "purpose" the absence of a specific intent. So construed they are inconclusive. In any event they are ambiguous and must be recast on remand of the cases. Third, monopoly power, whether lawfully or unlawfully acquired, may violate § 2 of the Sherman Act though it remains unexercised (United States v. Griffith, ante, p. 100), for as we stated in American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 809, 811, the existence of power "to exclude competition when it is desired to do so" is itself a violation of § 2, provided it is coupled with the purpose or intent to exercise that power. The District Court, being primarily concerned with the number and extent of the theatre holdings of defendants, did not address itself to this phase of the monopoly problem. Here also, parity of treatment as between independents and the five majors as theatre owners, who were tied into the same general conspiracy, necessitates consideration of this question.

Exploration of these phases of the cases would not be necessary if, as the Department of Justice argues, vertical integration of producing, distributing and exhibiting motion pictures is illegal per se. But the majority of the Court does not take that view. In the opinion of the majority the legality of vertical integration under the Sherman Act turns on (1) the purpose or intent with which it was conceived, or (2) the power it creates and the attendant purpose or intent. First, it runs afoul of the Sherman Act if it was a calculated scheme to gain control over an appreciable segment of the market and to restrain or suppress competition, rather than an expansion to meet legitimate business needs. United States v. Reading Co., 253 U.S. 26, 57; United States v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 254 U.S. 255, 269–270. Second, a vertically integrated enterprise, like other aggregations of business units (United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416), will constitute monopoly which, though unexercised, violates the Sherman Act provided a power to exclude competition is coupled with a purpose or intent to do so. As we pointed out in United States v. Griffith, ante, p. 100, 107, n. 10, size is itself an earmark of monopoly power. For size carries with it an opportunity for abuse. And the fact that the power created by size was utilized in the past to crush or prevent competition is potent evidence that the requisite purpose or intent attends the presence of monopoly power. See United States v. Swift & Co., 286 U.S. 106, 116; United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, supra, p. 430. Likewise bearing on the question whether monopoly power is created by the vertical integration, is the nature of the market to be served (United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, supra, p. 430), and the leverage on the market which the particular vertical integration creates or makes possible.

These matters were not considered by the District Court. For that reason, as well as the others we have mentioned, the findings on monopoly and divestiture which we have discussed in this part of the opinion will be set aside. There is an independent reason for doing that. As we have seen, the District Court considered competitive bidding as an alternative to divestiture in the sense that it concluded that further consideration of divestiture should not be had until competitive bidding had been tried and found wanting. Since we eliminate from the decree the provisions for competitive bidding, it is necessary to set aside the findings on divestiture so that a new start on this phase of the cases may be made on their remand.

It follows that the provision of the decree barring the five majors from further theatre expansion should likewise be eliminated. For it too is related to the monopoly question; and the District Court should be allowed to make an entirely fresh start on the whole of the problem. We in no way intimate, however, that the District Court erred in prohibiting further theatre expansion by the five majors.

The Department of Justice maintains that if total divestiture is denied, licensing of films among the five majors should be barred. As a permanent requirement it would seem to be only an indirect way of forcing divestiture. For the findings reveal that the five majors could not operate their theatres full time on their own films.[2] Whether that step would, in absence of competitive bidding, serve as a short-range remedy in certain situations to dissipate the effects of the conspiracy (United States v. Univis Lens Co., 316 U.S. 241, 254; United States v. Bausch & Lomb Co., supra, p. 724; United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, p. 188) is a question for the District Court.

[2] The District Court found, "Except for a very limited number of theatres in the very largest cities, the 18,000 and more theatres in the United States exhibit the product of more than one distributor. Such theatres could not be operated on the product of only one distributor."

Fourth

The consent decree created an arbitration system which had, in the view of the District Court, proved useful in its operation. The court indeed thought that the arbitration system had dealt with the problems of clearances and runs "with rare efficiency." But it did not think it had the power to continue an arbitration system which would be binding on the parties, since the consent decree did not bind the defendants who had not consented to it and since the government, acting pursuant to the powers reserved under the consent decree, moved for trial of the issues charged in the complaint. The District Court recommended, however, that some such system be continued. But it included no such provision in its decree.

We agree that the government did not consent to a permanent system of arbitration under the consent decree and that the District Court has no power to force or require parties to submit to arbitration in lieu of the remedies afforded by Congress for enforcing the antitrust laws. But the District Court has the power to authorize the maintenance of such a system by those parties who consent and to provide the rules and procedure under which it is to operate. The use of the system would not, of course, be mandatory. It would be merely an auxiliary enforcement procedure, barring no one from the use of other remedies the law affords for violations either of the Sherman Act or of the decree of the court. Whether such a system of arbitration should be inaugurated is for the discretion of the District Court.

Fifth—Intervention

Certain associations of exhibitors and a number of independent exhibitors, appellant-intervenors in Nos. 85 and 86, were denied leave to intervene in the District Court. They appeal from those orders. They also filed orginal motions for leave to intervene in this Court. We postponed consideration of the original motions and of our jurisdiction to hear the appeals until a hearing on the merits of the cases.

Rule 24(a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, which provides for intervention as of right, reads in part as follows: "Upon timely application anyone shall be permitted to intervene in an action: . . . (2) when the representation of the applicant's interest by existing parties is or may be inadequate and the applicant is or may be bound by a judgment in the action."

The complaint of the intervenors was directed towards the system of competitive bidding. The Department of Justice is the representative of the public in these antitrust suits. So far as the protection of the public interest in free competition is concerned, the interests of those intervenors was adequately represented. The intervenors, however, claim that the system of competitive bidding would have operated prejudicially to their rights. Cf. United States v. St. Louis Terminal, 236 U.S. 194, 199. Their argument is that the plan of competitive bidding under the control of the defendants would be a concert of action that would be illegal but for the decree. If pursuant to the decree defendants acted under that plan, they would gain immunity from any liability under the antitrust laws which otherwise they might have to the intervenors. Thus, it is argued, the decree would affect their legal rights and be binding on them. The representation of their interests by the Department of Justice on that score was said to be inadequate since that agency proposed the idea of competitive bidding in the District Court.

We need not consider the merits of that argument. Even if we assume that the intervenors are correct in their position, intervention should be denied here and the orders of the District Court denying leave to intervene must be affirmed. Now that the provisions for competitive bidding have been eliminated from the decree, there is no basis for saying that the decree affects their legal rights. Whatever may have been the situation below, no other reason appears why at this stage their intervention is warranted. Any justification for making them parties has disappeared.

The judgment in these cases is affirmed in part and reversed in part, and the cases are remanded to the District Court for proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

So ordered.

Mr. Justice Jackson took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

Mr. Justice Frankfurter, dissenting in part.

"The framing of decrees should take place in the District rather than in Appellate Courts. They are invested with large discretion to model their judgments to fit the exigencies of the particular case." On this guiding consideration, the Court earlier this Term sustained a Sherman Law decree, which was not the outcome of a long trial involving complicated and contested facts and their significance, but the formulation of a summary judgment on the bare bones of pleadings. International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, 400–401. The record in this case bespeaks more compelling respect for the decree fashioned by the District Court of three judges to put an end to violations of the Sherman Law and to prevent the recurrence, than that which led this Court not to find abuse of discretion in the decree by a single district judge in the International Salt case.

This Court has both the authority and duty to consider whether a decree is well calculated to undo, as far as is possible, the result of transactions forbidden by the Sherman Law and to guard against their repetition. But it is not the function of this Court, and it would ill discharge it, to displace the district courts and write decrees de novo. We are, after all, an appellate tribunal even in Sherman Law cases. It could not be fairly claimed that this Court possesses greater experience, understanding and prophetic insight in relation to the movie industry, and is therefore better equipped to formulate a decree for the movie industry than was the District Court in this case, presided over as it was by one of the wisest of judges.

The terms of the decree in this litigation amount, in effect, to the formulation of a regime for the future conduct of the movie industry. The terms of such a regime, within the scope of judicial oversight, are not to be derived from precedents in the law reports, nor, for that matter, from any other available repository of knowledge. Inescapably the terms must be derived from an assessment of conflicting interests, not quantitatively measurable, and a prophecy regarding the workings of untried remedies for dealing with disclosed evils so as to advance most the comprehensive public interest.

The crucial legal question before us is not whether we would have drawn the decree as the District Court drew it, but whether, on the basis of what came before the District Court, we can say that in fashioning remedies it did not fairly respond to disclosed violations and therefore abused a discretion, the fair exercise of which we should respect and not treat as an abuse. Discretion means a choice of available remedies. As bearing upon this question, it is most relevant to consider whether the District Court showed a sympathetic or mere niggling awareness of the proper scope of the Sherman Law and the range of its condemnation. Adequate remedies are not likely to be fashioned by those who are not hostile to evils to be remedied. The District Court's opinion manifests a stout purpose on the part of that court to enforce its thoroughgoing understanding of the requirements of the Sherman Law as elucidated by this Court. And so we have before us the decree of a district court thoroughly aware of the demands of the Sherman Law and manifestly determined to enforce it in all its rigors.

How did the District Court go about working out the terms of the decree some of which this Court now displaces? The case was before that court from October 8, 1945, to January 22, 1947. A vast body of the evidence which had to be considered below, and must be considered here in overturning the lower court's decree, consisted of documents. A mere enumeration of these documents, not printed in the record before us, required a pamphlet of 42 pages. It took 460 pages for a selection of exhibits deemed appropriate for printing by the Government. The printed record in this Court consists of 3,841 pages. It is on the basis of this vast mass of evidence that the District Court, on June 11, 1946, filed its careful opinion, approved here, as to the substantive issues. Thereafter, it heard argument for three days as to the terms of the judgment. The parties then submitted their proposals for findings of fact and conclusions of law by the District Court. After a long trial, an elaborate opinion on the merits, full discussion as to the terms of the decree, more than two months for the gestation of the decree, the terms were finally promulgated.

I cannot bring myself to conclude that the product of such a painstaking process of adjudication as to a decree appropriate for such a complicated situation as this record discloses was an abuse of discretion, arrived at as it was after due absorption of all the light that could be shed upon remedies appropriate for the future. After all, as to such remedies there is no test, ultimately, except the wisdom of men judged by events.

Accordingly, I would affirm the decree except as to one particular, that regarding an arbitration system for controversies that may arise under the decree. This raises a pure question of law and not a judgment based upon facts and their significance, as are those features of the decree which the Court sets aside. The District Court indicated that "in view of its demonstrated usefulness" such an arbitration system was desirable to aid in the enforcement of the decree. The District Court, however, deemed itself powerless to continue an arbitration system without the consent of the parties. I do not find such want of power in the District Court to select this means of enforcing the decree most effectively, with the least friction and by the most fruitful methods. A decree as detailed and as complicated as is necessary to fit a situation like the one before us is bound, even under the best of circumstances, to raise controversies involving conflicting claims as to facts and their meaning. A court could certainly appoint a master to deal with questions arising under the decree. I do not appreciate why a proved system of arbitration, appropriate as experience has found it to be appropriate for adjudicating numberless questions that arise under such a decree, is not to be treated in effect as a standing master for purposes of this decree. See Ex parte Peterson, 253 U.S. 300. I would therefore leave it to the discretion of the District Court to determine whether such a system is not available as an instrument of auxiliary enforcement. With this exception I would affirm the decree of the District Court.

OPINION OF THE COURT

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

In view of our dependence upon regulated private enterprise in discharging the far-reaching role which radio plays in our society, a somewhat detailed exposition of the history of the present controversy and the issues which it raises is appropriate.

These suits were brought on October 30, 1941, to enjoin the enforcement of the Chain Broadcasting Regulations promulgated by the Federal Communications Commission on May 2, 1941, and amended on October 11, 1941. We held last Term in Columbia System v. United States, 316 U.S. 407, and National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 316 U.S. 447, that the suits could be maintained under § 402 (a) of the Communications Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 1093, 47 U.S.C. § 402 (a) (incorporating by reference the Urgent Deficiencies Act of October 22, 1913, 38 Stat. 219, 28 U.S.C. § 47), and that the decrees of the District Court dismissing the suits for want of jurisdiction should therefore be reversed. On remand the District Court granted the Government's motions for summary judgment and dismissed the suits on the merits. 47 F. Supp. 940. The cases are now here on appeal. 28 U.S.C. § 47. Since they raise substantially the same issues and were argued together, we shall deal with both cases in a single opinion.

On March 18, 1938, the Commission undertook a comprehensive investigation to determine whether special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting[1] were required in the "public interest, convenience, or necessity." The Commission's order directed that inquiry be made, inter alia, in the following specific matters: the number of stations licensed to or affiliated with networks, and the amount of station time used or controlled by networks; the contractual rights and obligations of stations under their agreements with networks; the scope of network agreements containing exclusive affiliation provisions and restricting the network from affiliating with other stations in the same area; the rights and obligations of stations with respect to network advertisers; the nature of the program service rendered by stations licensed to networks; the policies of networks with respect to character of programs, diversification, and accommodation to the particular requirements of the areas served by the affiliated stations; the extent to which affiliated stations exercise control over programs, advertising contracts, and related matters; the nature and extent of network program duplication by stations serving the same area; the extent to which particular networks have exclusive coverage in some areas; the competitive practices of stations engaged in chain broadcasting; the effect of chain broadcasting upon stations not licensed to or affiliated with networks; practices or agreements in restraint of trade, or in furtherance of monopoly, in connection with chain broadcasting; and the scope of concentration of control over stations, locally, regionally, or nationally, through contracts, common ownership, or other means.

On April 6, 1938, a committee of three Commissioners was designated to hold hearings and make recommendations to the full Commission. This committee held public hearings for 73 days over a period of six months, from November 14, 1938, to May 19, 1939. Order No. 37, announcing the investigation and specifying the particular matters which would be explored at the hearings, was published in the Federal Register, 3 Fed. Reg. 637, and copies were sent to every station licensee and network organization. Notices of the hearings were also sent to these parties. Station licensees, national and regional networks, and transcription and recording companies were invited to appear and give evidence. Others persons who sought to appear were afforded an opportunity to testify. 96 witnesses were heard by the committee, 45 of whom were called by the national networks. The evidence covers 27 volumes, including over 8,000 pages of transcript and more than 700 exhibits. The testimony of the witnesses called by the national networks fills more than 6,000 pages, the equivalent of 46 hearing days.

The committee submitted a report to the Commission on June 12, 1940, stating its findings and recommendations. Thereafter, briefs on behalf of the networks and other interested parties were filed before the full Commission, and on [1] Chain broadcasting is defined in § 3(p) of the Communications Act of 1934 as the "simultaneous broadcasting of an identical program by two or more connected stations." In actual practice, programs are transmitted by wire, usually leased telephone lines, from their point of origination to each station in the network for simultaneous broadcast over the air.

November 28, 1940, the Commission issued proposed regulations which the parties were requested to consider in the oral arguments held on December 2 and 3, 1940. These proposed regulations dealt with the same matters as those covered by the regulations eventually adopted by the Commission. On January 2, 1941, each of the national networks filed a supplementary brief discussing at length the questions raised by the committee report and the proposed regulations.

On May 2, 1941, the Commission issued its Report on Chain Broadcasting, setting forth its findings and conclusions upon the matters explored in the investigation, together with an order adopting the Regulations here assailed. Two of the seven members of the Commission dissented from this action. The effective date of the Regulations was deferred for 90 days with respect to existing contracts and arrangements of network-operated stations, and subsequently the effective date was thrice again postponed. On August 14, 1941, the Mutual Broadcasting Company petitioned the Commission to amend two of the Regulations. In considering this petition the Commission invited interested parties to submit their views. Briefs were filed on behalf of all of the national networks and oral argument was had before the Commission on September 12, 1941. And on October 11, 1941, the Commission (again with two members dissenting) issued a Supplemental Report, together with an order amending three Regulations. Simultaneously, the effective date of the Regulations was postponed until November 15, 1941, and provision was made for further postponements from time to time if necessary to permit the orderly adjustment of existing arrangements. Since October 30, 1941, when the present suits were filed, the enforcement of the Regulations has been stayed either voluntarily by the Commission or by order of the court.

Such is the history of the Chain Broadcasting Regulations. We turn now to the Regulations themselves, illumined by the practices in the radio industry disclosed by the Commission's investigation. The Regulations, which the Commission characterized in its Report as "the expression of the general policy we will follow in exercising our licensing power," are addressed in terms to station licensees and applicants for station licenses. They provide, in general, that no licenses shall be granted to stations or applicants having specified relationships with networks. Each Regulation is directed at a particular practice found by the Commission to be detrimental to the "public interest," and we shall consider them seriatim. In doing so, however, we do not overlook the admonition of the Commission that the Regulations as well as the network practices at which they are aimed are interrelated: "In considering above the network practices which necessitate the regulations we are adopting, we have taken each practice singly, and have shown that even in isolation each warrants the regulation addressed to it. But the various practices we have considered do not operate in isolation; they form a compact bundle or pattern, and the effect of their joint impact upon licensees necessitates the regulations even more urgently than the effect of each taken singly." (Report, p. 75.)

The Commission found that at the end of 1938 there were 660 commercial stations in the United States, and that 341 of these were affiliated with national networks. 135 stations were affiliated exclusively with the National Broadcasting Company, Inc., known in the industry as NBC, which operated two national networks, the "Red" and the "Blue." NBC was also the licensee of 10 stations, including 7 which operated on so-called clear channels with the maximum power available, 50 kilowatts; in addition, NBC operated 5 other stations, 4 of which had power of 50 kilowatts, under management contracts with their licensees. 102 stations were affiliated exclusively with the Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., which was also the licensee of 8 stations, 7 of which were clear-channel stations operating with power of 50 kilowatts. 75 stations were under exclusive affiliation with the Mutual Broadcasting System, Inc. In addition, 25 stations were affiliated with both NBC and Mutual, and 5 with both CBS and Mutual. These figures, the Commission noted, did not accurately reflect the relative prominence of the three companies, since the stations affiliated with Mutual were, generally speaking, less desirable in frequency, power, and coverage. It pointed out that the stations affiliated with the national networks utilized more than 97% of the total night-time broadcasting power of all the stations in the country. NBC and CBS together controlled more than 85% of the total night-time wattage, and the broadcast business of the three national network companies amounted to almost half of the total business of all stations in the United States.

The Commission recognized that network broadcasting had played and was continuing to play an important part in the development of radio. "The growth and development of chain broadcasting," it stated, "found its impetus in the desire to give widespread coverage to programs which otherwise would not be heard beyond the reception area of a single station. Chain broadcasting makes possible a wider reception for expensive entertainment and cultural programs and also for programs of national or regional significance which would otherwise have coverage only in the locality of origin. Furthermore, the access to greatly enlarged audiences made possible by chain broadcasting has been a strong incentive to advertisers to finance the production of expensive programs.... But the fact that the chain broadcasting method brings benefits and advantages to both the listening public and to broadcast station licensees does not mean that the prevailing practices and policies of the networks and their outlets are sound in all respects, or that they should not be altered. The Commission's duty under the Communications Act of 1934 is not only to see that the public receives the advantages and benefits of chain broadcasting, but also, so far as its powers enable it, to see that practices which adversely affect the ability of licensees to operate in the public interest are eliminated." (Report, p. 4.)

The Commission found that eight network abuses were amenable to correction within the powers granted it by Congress:

Regulation 3.101—Exclusive affiliation of station. The Commission found that the network affiliation agreements of NBC and CBS customarily contained a provision which prevented the station from broadcasting the programs of any other network. The effect of this provision was to hinder the growth of new networks, to deprive the listening public in many areas of service to which they were entitled, and to prevent station licensees from exercising their statutory duty of determining which programs would best serve the needs of their community. The Commission observed that in areas where all the stations were under exclusive contract to either NBC or CBS, the public was deprived of the opportunity to hear programs presented by Mutual. To take a case cited in the Report: In the fall of 1939 Mutual obtained the exclusive right to broadcast the World Series baseball games. It offered this program of outstanding national interest to stations throughout the country, including NBC and CBS affiliates in communities having no other stations. CBS and NBC immediately invoked the "exclusive affiliation" clauses of their agreements with these stations, and as a result thousands of persons in many sections of the country were unable to hear the broadcasts of the games.

"Restraints having this effect," the Commission observed, "are to be condemned as contrary to the public interest irrespective of whether it be assumed that Mutual programs are of equal, superior, or inferior quality. The important consideration is that station licensees are denied freedom to choose the programs which they believe best suited to their needs; in this manner the duty of a station licensee to operate in the public interest is defeated. . . . Our conclusion is that the disadvantages resulting from these exclusive arrangements far outweigh any advantages. A licensee station does not operate in the public interest when it enters into exclusive arrangements which prevent it from giving the public the best service of which it is capable, and which, by closing the door of opportunity in the network field, adversely affects the program structure of the entire industry." (Report, pp. 52, 57.) Accordingly, the Commission adopted Regulation 3.101, providing as follows: "No license shall be granted to a standard broadcast station having any contract, arrangement, or understanding, express or implied, with a network organization under which the station is prevented or hindered from, or penalized for, broadcasting the programs of any other network organization."

Regulation 3.102—Territorial exclusivity. The Commission found another type of "exclusivity" provision in network affiliation agreements whereby the network bound itself not to sell programs to any other station in the same area. The effect of this provision, designed to protect the affiliate from the competition of other stations serving the same territory, was to deprive the listening public of many programs that might otherwise be available. If an affiliated station rejected a network program, the "territorial exclusivity" clause of its affiliation agreement prevented the network from offering the program to other stations in the area. For example, Mutual presented a popular program, known as "The American Forum of the Air," in which prominent persons discussed topics of general interest. None of the Mutual stations in the Buffalo area decided to carry the program, and a Buffalo station not affiliated with Mutual attempted to obtain the program for its listeners. These efforts failed, however, on account of the "territorial exclusivity" provision in Mutual's agreements with its outlets. The result was that this program was not available to the people of Buffalo.

The Commission concluded that "It is not in the public interest for the listening audience in an area to be deprived of network programs not carried by one station where other stations in that area are ready and willing to broadcast the programs. It is as much against the public interest for a network affiliate to enter into a contractual arrangement which prevents another station from carrying a network program as it would be for it to drown out that program by electrical interference." (Report, p. 59.)

Recognizing that the "territorial exclusivity" clause was unobjectionable in so far as it sought to prevent duplication of programs in the same area, the Commission limited itself to the situations in which the clause impaired the ability of the licensee to broadcast available programs. Regulation 3.102, promulgated to remedy this particular evil, provides as follows: "No license shall be granted to a standard broadcast station having any contract, arrangement, or understanding, express or implied, with a network organization which prevents or hinders another station serving substantially the same area from broadcasting the network's programs not taken by the former station, or which prevents or hinders another station serving a substantially different area from broadcasting any program of the network organization. This regulation shall not be construed to prohibit any contract, arrangement, or understanding between a station and a network organization pursuant to which the station is granted the first call in its primary service area upon the programs of the network organization."

Regulation 3.103—Term of affiliation. The standard NBC and CBS affiliation contracts bound the station for a period of five years, with the network having the exclusive right to terminate the contracts upon one year's notice. The Commission, relying upon § 307(d) of the Communications Act of 1934, under which no license to operate a broadcast station can be granted for a longer term than three years, found the five-year affiliation term to be contrary to the policy of the Act: "Regardless of any changes that may occur in the economic, political, or social life of the Nation or of the community in which the station is located, CBS and NBC affiliates are bound by contract to continue broadcasting the network programs of only one network for 5 years. The licensee is so bound even though the policy and caliber of programs of the network may deteriorate greatly. The future necessities of the station and of the community are not considered. The station licensee is unable to follow his conception of the public interest until the end of the 5-year contract." (Report, p. 61.) The Commission concluded that under contracts binding the affiliates for five years, "stations become parties to arrangements which deprive the public of the improved service it might otherwise derive from competition in the network field; and that a station is not operating in the public interest when it so limits its freedom of action." (Report, p. 62.) Accordingly, the Commission adopted Regulation 3.103: "No license shall be granted to a standard broadcast station having any contract, arrangement, or understanding, express or implied, with a network organization which provides, by original term, provisions for renewal, or otherwise for the affiliation of the station with the network organization for a period longer than two years:[2] Provided, That a contract, arrangement, or understanding for a period up to two years, may be entered into within 120 days prior to the commencement of such period."

Regulation 3.104—Option time. The Commission found that network affiliation contracts usually contained so-called network optional time clauses. Under these provisions the network could upon 28 days' notice call upon its affiliates to carry a commercial program during any of the hours specified in the agreement as "network optional time." For CBS affiliates "network optional time" meant the entire broadcast day. For 29 outlets of NBC on the Pacific Coast, it also covered the entire broadcast day; for substantially all of the other NBC affiliates, it included 8½ hours on weekdays and 8 hours on Sundays. Mutual's contracts with about half of its affiliates contained such a provision, giving the network optional time for 3 or 4 hours on weekdays and 6 hours on Sundays.

In the Commission's judgment these optional time provisions, in addition to imposing serious obstacles in the path of new networks, hindered stations in developing a local program service. The exercise by the networks of their options over the station's time tended to prevent regular scheduling of local programs at desirable hours. The Commission found that "shifting a local commercial program may seriously interfere with the efforts of a [local] sponsor to build up a regular listening audience at a definite hour, and the long-term advertising contract becomes a highly dubious project. This hampers the efforts of the station to develop local commercial programs and affects adversely its ability to give the public good program service. . . . A station licensee must retain sufficient freedom of action to supply the program and advertising needs of the local community. Local program service is a vital part of community life. A station should be ready, able, and willing to serve the needs of the local community by broadcasting such outstanding local events as community concerts, civic meetings, local sports events, and other programs of local consumer and social interest. We conclude that national network time options have restricted the freedom of station licensees and hampered their efforts to broadcast local commercial programs, the programs of other national networks, and national spot transcriptions. We believe that these considerations far outweigh any supposed advantages from 'stability' of network operations under time options. We find that the optioning of time by licensee stations has operated against the public interest." (Report, pp. 63, 65.)

[2] Station licenses issued by the Commission normally last two years. Section 3.34 of the Commission's Rules and Regulations governing Standard and High-Frequency Broadcast Stations, as amended October 14, 1941.

The Commission undertook to preserve the advantages of option time, as a device for "stabilizing" the industry, without unduly impairing the ability of local stations to develop local program service. Regulation 3.104 called for the modification of the option-time provision in three respects: the minimum notice period for exercise of the option could not be less than 56 days; the number of hours which could be optioned was limited; and specific restrictions were placed upon exercise of the option to the disadvantaged of other networks. The text of the Regulation follows: "No license shall be granted to a standard broadcast station which options for network programs any time subject to call on less than 56 days' notice, or more time than a total of three hours within each of four segments of the broadcast day, as herein described. The broadcast day is divided into 4 segments, as follows: 8:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m.; 1:00 p.m. to 6:00 p.m.; 6:00 p.ms to 11:00 p.m.; 11:00 p.m. to 8:00 a.m. Such options may not be exclusive as against other network organizations and may not prevent or hinder the station from optioning or selling any or all of the time covered by the option, or other time, to other network organizations."

Regulation 3.105—Right to reject programs. The Commission found that most network affiliation contracts contained a clause defining the right of the station to reject network commercial programs. The NBC contracts provided simply that the station "may reject a network program the broadcasting of which would not be in the public interest, convenience, and necessity." NBC required a licensee who rejected a program to "be able to support his contention that what he has done has been more in the public interest than had he carried on the network program." Similarly, the CBS contracts provided that if the station had "reasonable objection to any sponsored program or the product advertised thereon as not being in the public interest, the station may, on 3 weeks' prior notice thereof to Columbia, refuse to broadcast such program, unless during such notice period such reasonable objection of the station shall be satisfied."

While seeming in the abstract to be fair, these provisions, according to the Commission's finding, did not sufficiently protect the "public interest." As a practical matter, the licensee could not determine in advance whether the broadcasting of any particular network program would or would not be in the public interest. "It is obvious that from such skeletal information [as the networks submitted to the stations prior to the broadcasts] the station cannot determine in advance whether the program is in the public interest, nor can it ascertain whether or not parts of the program are in one way or another offensive. In practice, if not in theory, stations affiliated with networks have delegated to the networks a large part of their programming functions. In many instances, moreover, the network further delegates the actual production of programs to advertising agencies. These agencies are far more than mere brokers or intermediaries between the network and the advertiser. To an ever-increasing extent, these agencies actually exercise the function of program production. Thus it is frequently neither the station nor the network, but rather the advertising agency, which determines what broadcast programs shall contain. Under such circumstances, it is especially important that individual stations, if they are to operate in the public interest, should have the practical opportunity as well as the contractual right to reject network programs. . . .

"It is the station, not the network, which is licensed to serve the public interest. The licensee has the duty of determining what programs shall be broadcast over his station's facilities, and cannot lawfully delegate this duty or transfer the control of his station directly to the network or indirectly to an advertising agency. He cannot lawfully bind himself to accept programs in every case where he cannot sustain the burden of proof that he has a better program. The licensee is obliged to reserve to himself the final decision as to what programs will best serve the public interest. We conclude that a licensee is not fulfilling his obligations to operate in the public interest, and is not operating in accordance with the express requirements of the Communications Act, if he agrees to accept programs on any basis other than his own reasonable decision that the programs are satisfactory." (Report, pp. 39, 66.)

The Commission undertook in Regulation 3.105 to formulate the obligations of licensees with respect to supervision over programs: "No license shall be granted to a standard broadcast station having any contract, arrangement, or understanding, express or implied, with a network organization which (a), with respect to programs offered pursuant to an affiliation contract, prevents or hinders the station from rejecting or refusing network programs which the station reasonably believes to be unsatisfactory or unsuitable; or which (b), with respect to network programs so offered or already contracted for, prevents the station from rejecting or refusing any program which, in its opinion, is contrary to the public interest, or from substituting a program of outstanding local or national importance."

Regulation 3.106—Network ownership of stations. The Commission found that NBC, in addition to its network operations, was the licensee of 10 stations, 2 each in New York, Chicago, Washington, and San Francisco, 1 in Denver, and 1 in Cleveland. CBS was the licensee of 8 stations, 1 in each of these cities: New York, Chicago, Washington, Boston, Minneapolis, St. Louis, Charlotte, and Los Angeles. These 18 stations owned by NBC and CBS, the Commission observed, were among the most powerful and desirable in the country, and were permanently inaccessible to competing networks. "Competition among networks for these facilities is nonexistent, as they are completely removed from the network-station market. It gives the network complete control over its policies. This 'bottling-up' of the best facilities has undoubtedly had a discouraging effect upon the creation and growth of new networks. Furthermore, common ownership of network and station places the network in a position where its interest as the owner of certain stations may conflict with its interest as a network organization serving affiliated stations. In dealings with advertisers, the network represents its own stations in a proprietary capacity and the affiliated stations in something akin to an agency capacity. The danger is present that the network organization will give preference to its own stations at the expense of its affiliates." (Report, p. 67.)

The Commission stated that if the question had arisen as an original matter, it might well have concluded that the public interest required severance of the business of station ownership from that of network operation. But since substantial business interests have been formed on the basis of the Commission's continued tolerance of the situation, it was found inadvisable to take such a drastic step. The Commission concluded, however, that "the licensing of two stations in the same area to a single network organization is basically unsound and contrary to the public interest," and that it was also against the "public interest" for network organizations to own stations in areas where the available facilities were so few or of such unequal coverage that competition would thereby be substantially restricted. Recognizing that these considerations called for flexibility in their application to particular situations, the Commission provided that "networks will be given full opportunity, on proper application for new facilities or renewal of existing licenses, to call to our attention any reasons why the principle should be modified or held inapplicable." (Report, p. 68.) Regulation 3.106 reads as follows: "No license shall be granted to a network organization, or to any person directly or indirectly controlled by or under common control with a network organization, for more than one standard broadcast station where one of the stations covers substantially the service area of the other station, or for any standard broadcast station in any locality where the existing standard broadcast stations are so few or of such unequal desirability (in terms of coverage, power, frequency, or other related matters) that competition would be substantially restrained by such licensing."

Regulation 3.107—Dual network operation. This regulation provides that: "No license shall be issued to a standard broadcast station affiliated with a network organization which maintains more than one network: Provided, That this regulation shall not be applicable if such networks are not operated simultaneously, or if there is no substantial overlap in the territory served by the group of stations comprising each such network." In its Supplemental Report of October 11, 1941, the Commission announced the indefinite suspension of this regulation. There is no occasion here to consider the validity of Regulation 3.107, since there is no immediate threat of its enforcement by the Commission.

Regulation 3.108—Control by networks of station rates. The Commission found that NBC's affiliation contracts contained a provision empowering the network to reduce the station's network rate, and thereby to reduce the compensation received by the station, if the station set a lower rate for non-network national advertising than the rate established by the contract for the network programs. Under this provision the station could not sell time to a national advertiser for less than it would cost the advertiser if he bought the time from NBC. In the words of NBC's vice-president, "This means simply that a national advertiser should pay the same price for the station whether he buys it through one source or another source. It means that we do not believe that our stations should go into competition with ourselves." (Report, p. 73.)

The Commission concluded that "it is against the public interest for a station licensee to enter into a contract with a network which has the effect of decreasing its ability to compete for national business. We believe that the public interest will best be served and listeners supplied with the best programs if stations bargain freely with national advertisers." (Report, p. 75.) Accordingly, the Commission adopted Regulation 3.108, which provides as follows: "No license shall be granted to a standard broadcast station having any contract, arrangement, or understanding, express or implied, with a network organization under which the station is prevented or hindered from, or penalized for, fixing or altering its rates for the sale of broadcast time for other than the network's programs."

The appellants attack the validity of these Regulations along many fronts. They contend that the Commission went beyond the regulatory powers conferred upon it by the Communications Act of 1934; that even if the Commission were authorized by the Act to deal with the matters comprehended by the Regulations, its action is nevertheless invalid because the Commission misconceived the scope of the Act, particularly § 313 which deals with the application of the anti-trust laws to the radio industry; that the Regulations are arbitrary and capricious; that if the Communications Act of 1934 were construed to authorize the promulgation of the Regulations, it would be an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power; and that, in any event, the Regulations abridge the appellants' right of free speech in violation of the First Amendment. We are thus called upon to determine whether Congress has authorized the Commission to exercise the power asserted by the Chain Broadcasting Regulations, and if it has, whether the Constitution forbids the exercise of such authority.

Federal regulations of radio[3] begins with the Wireless Ship Act of June 24, 1910, 36 Stat. 629, which forbade any steamer carrying or licensed to carry fifty or more persons to leave any American port unless equipped with efficient apparatus for radio communication, in charge of a skilled operator. The enforcement of this legislation was entrusted to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, who was in charge of the administration of the marine navigation laws. But it was not until 1912, when the United States ratified the first international radio treaty, 37 Stat. 1565, that the need for general regulation of radio communication became urgent. In order to fulfill our obligations under the treaty, Congress enacted the Radio Act of August 13, 1912, 37 Stat. 302. This statute forbade the operation of radio apparatus without a license from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor; it also allocated certain frequencies for the use of the Government, and imposed restrictions upon the character of wave emissions, the transmission of distress signals, and the like.

[3] The history of federal regulation of radio communication is summarized in Herring and Gross, Telecommunications (1936) 239–86; Administrative Procedure in Government Agencies, Monograph of the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure, Sen. Doc. No. 186, 76th Cong., 3d Sess., Part 3, dealing with the Federal Communications Commission, pp. 82–84; 1 Socolow, Law of Radio Broadcasting (1939) 38–61; Donovan, Origin and Development of Radio Law (1930).

The enforcement of the Radio Act of 1912 presented no serious problems prior to the World War. Questions of interference arose only rarely because there were more than enough frequencies for all the stations then in existence. The war accelerated the development of the art, however, and in 1921 the first standard broadcast stations were established. They grew rapidly in number, and by 1923 there were several hundred such stations throughout the country. The Act of 1912 had not set aside any particular frequencies for the use of private broadcast stations; consequently, the Secretary of Commerce selected two frequencies, 750 and 833 kilocycles, and licensed all stations to operate upon one or the other of these channels. The number of stations increased so rapidly, however, and the situation became so chaotic, that the Secretary, upon the recommendation of the National Radio Conferences which met in Washington in 1923 and 1924, established a policy of assigning specified frequencies to particular stations. The entire radio spectrum was divided into numerous bands, each allocated to a particular kind of service. The frequencies ranging from 550 to 1500 kilocycles (96 channels in all, since the channels were separated from each other by 10 kilocycles) were assigned to the standard broadcast stations. But the problems created by the enormously rapid development of radio were far from solved. The increase in the number of channels was not enough to take care of the constantly growing number of stations. Since there were more stations than available frequencies, the Secretary of Commerce attempted to find room for everybody by limiting the power and hours of operation of stations in order that several stations might use the same channel. The number of stations multiplied so rapidly, however, that by November, 1925, there were almost 600 stations in the country, and there were 175 applications for new stations. Every channel in the standard broadcast band was, by that time, already occupied by at least one station, and many by several. The new stations could be accommodated only by extending the standard broadcast band, at the expense of the other types of services, or by imposing still greater limitations upon time and power. The National Radio Conference which met in November, 1925, opposed both of these methods and called upon Congress to remedy the situation through legislation.

The Secretary of Commerce was powerless to deal with the situation. It had been held that he could not deny a license to an otherwise legally qualified applicant on the ground that the proposed station would interfere with existing private or Government stations. Hoover v. Intercity Radio Co., 52 App. D.C. 339, 286 F. 1003. And on April 16, 1926, an Illinois district court held that the Secretary had no power to impose restrictions as to frequency, power, and hours of operation, and that a station's use of a frequency not assigned to it was not a violation of the Radio Act of 1912. United States v. Zenith Radio Corp., 12 F. 2d 614. This was followed on July 8, 1926, by an opinion of Acting Attorney General Donovan that the Secretary of Commerce had no power, under the Radio Act of 1912, to regulate the power, frequency or hours of operation of stations. 35 Ops. Atty. Gen. 126. The next day the Secretary of Commerce issued a statement abandoning all his efforts to regulate radio and urging that the stations undertake self-regulation.

But the plea of the Secretary went unheeded. From July, 1926, to February 23, 1927, when Congress enacted the Radio Act of 1927, 44 Stat. 1162, almost 200 new stations went on the air. These new stations used any frequencies they desired, regardless of the interference thereby caused to others. Existing stations changed to other frequencies and increased their power and hours of operation at will. The result was confusion and chaos. With everybody on the air, nobody could be heard. The situation became so intolerable that the President in his message of December 7, 1926, appealed to Congress to enact a comprehensive radio law:

"Due to the decisions of the courts, the authority of the department [of Commerce] under the law of 1912 has broken down; many more stations have been operating than can be accommodated within the limited number of wave lengths available; further stations are in course of construction; many stations have departed from the scheme of allocations set down by the department, and the whole service of this most important public function has drifted into such chaos as seems likely, if not remedied, to destroy its great value. I most urgently recommend that this legislation should be speedily enacted." (H. Doc. 483, 69th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 10.)

The plight into which radio fell prior to 1927 was attributable to certain basic facts about radio as a means of communication—its facilities are limited; they are not available to all who may wish to use them; the radio spectrum simply is not large enough to accommodate everybody. There is a fixed natural limitation upon the number of stations that can operate without interfering with one another.[4] Regulation of radio was therefore as vital to its development as traffic control was to the development of the automobile. In enacting the Radio Act of 1927, the first comprehensive scheme of control over radio communication, Congress acted upon the knowledge that if the potentialities of radio were not to be wasted, regulation was essential.

The Radio Act of 1927 created the Federal Radio Commission, composed of five members, and endowed the Commission with wide licensing and regulatory powers. We do not pause here to enumerate the scope of the Radio Act of 1927 and of the authority entrusted to the Radio Commission, for the basic provisions of that Act are incorporated in the Communications Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 1064, 47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., the legislation immediately before us. As we noted in Federal Communications Comm'n v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 137, "In its essentials the Communications Act of 1934 [so far as its provisions relating to radio are concerned] derives from the Federal Radio Act of 1927. . . . By this Act Congress, in order to protect the national interest involved in the new and far-reaching science of broadcasting, formulated a unified and comprehensive regulatory system for the industry. The common factors in the administration of the various statutes by which Congress had supervised the different modes of communication led to the creation, in the Act of 1934, of the Communications Commission. But the objectives of the legislation have remained substantially unaltered since 1927."

Section 1 of the Communications Act states its "purpose of regulating interstate and foreign commerce in communication by wire and radio so as to make available, so far as possible, to all the people of the United States a rapid, efficient, Nation-wide, and world-wide wire and radio communication service with adequate facilities at reasonable charges." Section 301 particularizes this general purpose with respect to radio: "It is the purpose of this Act, among other things, to maintain the control of the United States over all the channels of interstate and foreign radio transmission; and to provide for the use of such channels, but not the ownership thereof, by persons for limited periods of time, under licenses granted by Federal authority, and no such license shall be construed to create any right, beyond the terms, conditions, and periods of the license." To that end a Commission composed of seven members was created, with broad licensing and regulatory powers.

Section 303 provides:

"Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the Commission from time to time, as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires, shall—

(a) Classify radio stations;

(b) Prescribe the nature of the service to be rendered by each class of licensed stations and each station within any class;

* * * * * * *

(f) Make such regulations not inconsistent with law as it may deem necessary to prevent interference between stations and to carry out the provisions of this Act . . .;

(g) Study new uses for radio, provide for experimental uses of frequencies, and generally encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest;

* * * * * * *

(i) Have authority to make special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting;

* * * * * * *

(r) Make such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. . . ."

The criterion governing the exercise of the Commission's licensing power is the "public interest, convenience, or necessity." §§ 307(a)(d), 309(a), 310, 312. In addition, § 307(b) directs the Commission that "In considering applications for licenses, and modifications and renewals thereof, when and insofar as there is demand for the same, the Commission shall make such distribution of licenses, frequencies, hours of operation, and of power among the several States and communities as to provide a fair, efficient, and equitable distribution of radio service to each of the same."

The Act itself establishes that the Commission's powers are not limited to the engineering and technical aspects of regulation of radio communication. Yet we are asked to regard the Commission as a kind of traffic officer, policing the wave lengths to prevent stations from interfering with each other. But the Act does not restrict the Commission merely to supervision of the traffic. It puts upon the Commission the burden of determining the composition of that traffic. The facilities of radio are not large enough to accommodate all who wish to use them. Methods must be devised for choosing from among the many who apply. And since Congress itself could not do this, it committed the task to the Commission.

The Commission was, however, not left at large in performing this duty. The touchstone provided by Congress was the "public interest, convenience, or necessity," a criterion which "is as concrete as the complicated factors for judgment in such a field of delegated authority permit." Federal Communications Comm'n v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 138. "This criterion is not to be interpreted as setting up a standard so indefinite as to confer an unlimited power. Compare New York Central Securities Co. v. United States, 287 U.S. 12, 24. The requirement is to be interpreted by its context, by the nature of radio transmission and reception, by the scope, character and quality of services . . ." Federal Radio Comm'n v. Nelson Bros. Co., 289 U.S. 266, 285.

The "public interest" to be served under the Communications Act is thus the interest of the listening public in "the larger and more effective use of radio." § 303(g). The facilities of radio are limited and therefore precious; they cannot be left to wasteful use without detriment to the public interest. "An important element of public interest and convenience affecting the issue of a license is the ability of the licensee to render the best practicable service to the community reached by his broadcasts." Federal Communications Comm'n v. Sanders Radio Station, 309 U.S. 470, 475. The Commission's licensing function cannot be discharged, therefore, merely by finding that there are no technological objections to the granting of a license. If the criterion of "public interest" were limited to such matters, how could the Commission choose between two applicants for the same facilities, each of whom is financially and technically qualified to operate a station? Since the very inception of federal regulation by radio, comparative considerations as to the services to be rendered have governed the application of the standard of "public interest, convenience, or necessity." See Federal Communications Comm'n v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 138 n. 2.

The avowed aim of the Communications Act of 1934 was to secure the maximum benefits of radio to all the people of the United States. To that end Congress endowed the Communications Commission with comprehensive powers to promote and realize the vast potentialities of radio. Section 303(g) provides that the Commission shall 'generally encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest"; subsection (i) gives the Commission specific "authority to make special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting"; and subsection (r) empowers it to adopt "such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act."

These provisions, individually and in the aggregate, preclude the notion that the Commission is empowered to deal only with technical and engineering impediments to the "larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest." We cannot find in the Act any such restriction of the Commission's authority. Suppose, for example, that a community can, because of physical limitations, be assigned only two stations. That community might be deprived of effective service in any one of several ways. More powerful stations in nearby cities might blanket out the signals of the local stations so that they could not be heard at all. The stations might interfere with each other so that neither could be clearly heard. One station might dominate the other with the power of its signal. But the community could be deprived of good radio service in ways less crude. One man, financially and technically qualified, might apply for and obtain the licenses of both stations and present a single service over the two stations, thus wasting a frequency otherwise available to the area. The language of the Act does not withdraw such a situation from the licensing and regulatory powers of the Commission, and there is no evidence that Congress did not mean its broad language to carry the authority it expresses.

In essence, the Chain Broadcasting Regulations represent a particularization of the Commission's conception of the "public interest" sought to be safeguarded by Congress in enacting the Communications Act of 1934. The basic consideration of policy underlying the Regulations is succinctly stated in its Report: "With the number of radio channels limited by natural factors, the public interest demands that those who are entrusted with the available channels shall make the fullest and most effective use of them. If a licensee enters into a contract with a network organization which limits his ability to make the best use of the radio facility assigned him, he is not serving the public interest. . . . The net effect [of the practices disclosed by the investigation] has been that broadcasting service has been maintained at a level below that possible under a system of free competition. Having so found, we would be remiss in our statutory duty of encouraging 'the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest' if we were to grant licenses to persons who persist in these practices." (Report, pp. 81, 82.)

We would be asserting our personal views regarding the effective utilization of radio were we to deny that the Commission was entitled to find that the large public aims of the Communications Act of 1934 comprehend the considerations which moved the Commission in promulgating the Chain Broadcasting Regulations. True enough, the Act does not explicitly say that the Commission shall have power to deal with network practices found inimical to the public interest. But Congress was acting in a field of regulation which was both new and dynamic. "Congress moved under the spur of a widespread fear that in the absence of governmental control the public interest might be subordinated to monopolistic domination in the broadcasting field." Federal Communications Comm'n v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 137. In the context of the developing problems to which it was directed, the Act gave the Commission not niggardly but expansive powers. It was given a comprehensive mandate to "encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest," if need be, by making "special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting." § 303(g)(i).

Generalities unrelated to the living problems of radio communications of course cannot justify exercises of power by the Commission. Equally so, generalities empty of all concrete considerations of the actual bearing of regulations promulgated by the Commission to the subject-matter entrusted to it, cannot strike down exercises of power by the Commission. While Congress did not give the Commission unfettered discretion to regulate all phases of the radio industry, it did not frustrate the purposes for which the Communications Act of 1934 was brought into being by attempting an itemized catalogue of the specific manifestations of the general problems for the solution of which it was establishing a regulatory agency. That would have stereotyped the powers of the Commission to specific details in regulating a field of enterprise the dominant characteristic of which was the rapid pace of its unfolding. And so Congress did what experience had taught it in similar attempts at regulation, even in fields where the subject-matter of regulation was far less fluid and dynamic than radio. The essence of that experience was to define broad areas for regulation and to establish standards for judgment adequately related in their application to the problems to be solved.

For the cramping construction of the Act pressed upon us, support cannot be found in its legislative history. The principal argument is that § 303(i), empowering the Commission "to make special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting," intended to restrict the scope of the Commission's powers to the technical and engineering aspects of chain broadcasting. This provision comes from § 4(h) of the Radio Act of 1927. It was introduced into the legislation as a Senate committee amendment to the House bill (H.R. 9971, 69th Cong., 1st Sess.) This amendment originally read as follows:

"(C) The commission, from time to time, as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires, shall—

* * * * * * *

(j) When stations are connected by wire for chain broadcasting, determine the power each station shall use and the wave lengths to be used during the time stations are so connected and so operated, and make all other regulations necessary in the interest of equitable radio service to the listeners in the communities or areas affected by chain broadcasting."

The report of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, which submitted this amendment, stated that under the bill the Commission was given "complete authority . . . to control chain broadcasting." Sen. Rep. No. 772, 69th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 3. The bill as thus amended was passed by the Senate, and then sent to conference. The bill that emerged from the conference committee, and which became the Radio Act of 1927, phrased the amendment in the general terms now contained in § 303(i) of the 1934 Act: the Commission was authorized "to make special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting." The conference reports do not give any explanation of this particular change in phrasing, but they do state that the jurisdiction conferred upon the Commission by the conference bill was substantially identical with that conferred by the bill passed by the Senate. See Sen. Doc. No. 200, 69th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 17; H. Rep. 1886, 69th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 17. We agree with the District Court that in view of this legislation history, § 303(i) cannot be construed as no broader than the first clause of the Senate amendment, which limited the Commission's authority to the technical and engineering phases of chain broadcasting. There is no basis for assuming that the conference intended to preserve the first clause, which was of limited scope, and abandon the second clause, which was of general scope, by agreeing upon a provision which was broader and more comprehensive than those it supplanted.[5]

A totally different source of attack upon the Regulations is found in § 311 of the Act, which authorizes the Commission to withhold licenses from persons convicted of having violated the anti-trust laws. Two contentions are made—first, that this provision puts considerations relating to competition outside the Commission's concern before an applicant has been convicted of monopoly or other restraints of trade, and second, that, in any event, the Commission misconceived the scope of its powers under § 311 in issuing the Regulations. Both of these contentions are unfounded. Section 311 derives from § 13 of the Radio Act of 1927, which expressly commanded, rather than merely authorized, the Commission to refuse a license to any person judicially found guilty of having violated the anti-trust laws. The change in the 1934 Act was made, in the words of Senator Dill, the manager of the legislation in the Senate, because "it seemed fair to the committee to do that." 78 Cong. Rec. 8825. The Commission was thus permitted to exercise its judgment as to whether violation of the anti-trust laws disqualified an applicant from operating a station in the "public interest." We agree with the District Court that "The necessary implication from this [amendment in 1934] was that the Commission might infer from the fact that the applicant had in the past tried to monopolize radio, or had engaged in unfair methods of competition, that the disposition so manifested would continue and that if it did it would make him an unfit licensee." 47 F. Supp. 940, 944.

That the Commission may refuse to grant a license to persons adjudged guilty in a court of law of conduct in violation of the anti-trust laws certainly does not render irrelevant consideration by the Commission of the effect of such conduct upon the "public interest, convenience, or necessity." A licensee charged with practices in contravention of this standard cannot continue to hold his license merely because his conduct is also in violation of the anti-trust laws and he has not yet been proceeded against and convicted. By clarifying in § 311 the scope of the Commission's authority in dealing with persons convicted of violating the anti-trust laws, Congress can hardly be deemed to have limited the concept of "public interest" so as to exclude all considerations relating to monopoly and unreasonable restraints upon commerce. Nothing in the provisions or history of the Act lends support to the inference that the Commission was denied the power to refuse a license to a station not operating in the "public interest," merely because its misconduct happened to be an unconvicted violation of the anti-trust laws.

[5] In the course of the Senate debates on the conference report upon the bill that became the Radio Act of 1927, Senator Dill, who was in charge of the bill, said, "While the commission would have the power under the general terms of the bill, the bill specifically sets out as one of the special powers of the commission the right to make specific regulations for governing chain broadcasting. As to creating a monopoly of radio in this country, let me say that this bill absolutely protects the public, so far as it can protect them, by giving the commission full power to refuse a license to anyone who it believes will not serve the public interest, convenience, or necessity. It specifically provides that any corporation guilty of monopoly shall not only not receive a license but that its license may be revoked; and if after a corporation has received its license for a period of three years it is then discovered and found to be guilty of monopoly, its license will be revoked. . . . In addition to that, the bill contains a provision that no license may be transferred from one owner to another without the written consent of the commission, and the commission, of course, having the power to protect against a monopoly, must give such protection. I wish to state further that the only way by which monopolies in the radio business can secure control of radio here, even for a limited period of time, will be by the commission becoming servile to them. Power must be lodged somewhere, and I myself am unwilling to assume in advance that the commission proposed to be created will be servile to the desires and demands of great corporations of this country." 68 Cong. Rec. 2881.

Alternatively, it is urged that the Regulations constitute an ultra vires attempt by the Commission to enforce the anti-trus laws, and that the enforcement of the anti-trust laws is the province not of the Commission but of the Attorney General and the courts. This contention misconceives the basis of the Commission's action. The Commission's Report indicates plainly enough that the Commission was not attempting to administer the ant-trust laws:

"The prohibitions of the Sherman Act apply to broadcasting. This Commission, although not charged with the duty of enforcing that law, should administer its regulatory powers with respect to broadcasting in the light of the purposes which the Sherman Act was designed to achieve. . . . While many of the network practices raise serious questions under the antitrust laws, our jurisdiction does not depend on a showing that they do in fact constitute a violation of the antitrust laws. It is not our function to apply the antitrust laws as such. It is our duty, however, to refuse licenses or renewals to any person who engages or proposes to engage in practices which will prevent either himself or other licensees or both from making the fullest use of radio facilities. This is the standard of public interest, convenience or necessity which we must apply to all applications for licenses and renewals. . . . We do not predicate our jurisdiction to issue the regulations on the ground that the network practices violate the antitrust laws. We are issuing these regulations because we have found that the network practices prevent the maximum utilization of radio facilities in the public interest." (Report, pp. 46, 83, 83 n. 3.)

We conclude, therefore, that the Communications Act of 1934 authorized the Commission to promulgate regulations designed to correct the abuses disclosed by its investigation of chain broadcasting. There remains for consideration the claim that the Commission's exercise of such authority was unlawful.

The Regulations are assailed as "arbitrary and capricious." If this contention means that the Regulations are unwise, that they are not likely to succeed in accomplishing what the Commission intended, we can say only that the appellants have selected the wrong forum for such a plea. What was said in Board of Trade v. United States, 314 U. S. 534, 548, is relevant here: "We certainly have neither technical competence nor legal authority to pronounce upon the wisdom of the course taken by the Commission." Our duty is at an end when we find that the action of the Commission was based upon findings supported by evidence, and was made pursuant to authority granted by Congress. It is not for us to say that the "public interest" will be furthered or retarded by the Chair Broadcasting Regulations. The responsibility belongs to the Congress for the grant of valid legislative authority and to the Commission for its exercise.

It would be sheer dogmatism to say that the Commission made out no case for its allowable discretion in formulating these Regulations. Its long investigation disclosed the existences of practices which it regarded as contrary to the "public interest." The Commission knew that the wisdom of any actoon it took would have to be tested by experience: "We are under no illusion that the regulations we are adopting will solve all questions of public interest with respect to the network system of program distribution. * * * The problems in the network field are interdependent, and the steps now taken may perhaps operate as a partial solution of problems not directly dealt with at this time. Such problems may be examined again at some future time after the regulations here adopted have been given a fair trial." (Report, p. 88.) The problems with which the Commission attempted to deal could not be solved at once and for all time by rigid rules-of-thumb. The Commission therefore did not bind itself inflexibly to the licensing policies expressed in the Regulations. In each case that comes before it the Commission must still exercise an ultimate judgment whether the grant of a license would serve the "public interest, convenience, or necessity." If time and changing circumstances reveal that the "public interest" is not served by application of the Regulations, it must be assumed that the Commission will act in accordance with its statutory obligations.

Since there is no basis for any claim that the Commission failed to observe procedural safeguards required by law, we reach the contention that the Regulations should be denied enforcement on constitutional grounds. Here, as in New York Central Securities Corp. v. United States, 287 U.S. 12, 24–25, the claim is made that the standard of "public interest" governing the exercise of the powers delegated to the Commission by Congress is so vague and indefinite that, if it be construed as comprehensively as the words alone permit, the delegation of legislative authority is unconstitutional. But, as we held in that case, "It is a mistaken assumption that this is a mere general reference to public welfare without any standard to guide determinations. The purpose of the Act, the requirements it imposes, and the context of the provision in question show the contrary." Ibid. See Federal Radio Comm'n v. Nelson Bros. Co., 289 U.S. 266, 285; Federal Communications Comm'n v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 137–38. Compare Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388, 428; Intermountain Rate Cases, 234 U.S. 476, 486–89; United States v. Lowden, 308 U.S. 225.

We come, finally, to an appeal to the First Amendment. The Regulations, even if valid in all other respects, must fall because they abridge, say the appellants, their right of free speech. If that be so, it would follow that every person whose application for a license to operate a station is denied by the Commission is thereby denied his constitutional right of free speech. Freedom of utterance is abridged to many who wish to use the limited facilities of radio. Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all. That is its unique characteristic, and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to governmental regulation. Because it cannot be used by all, some who wish to use it must be denied. But Congress did not authorize the Commission to choose among applicants upon the basis of their political, economic or social views, or upon any other capricious basis. If it did, or if the Commission by these Regulations proposed a choice among applicants upon some such basis, the issue before us would be wholly different. The question here is simply whether the Comission, by announcing that it will refuse licenses to persons who engage in specified network practices (a basis for choice which we hold is comprehended within the statutory criterion of "public interest"), is thereby denying such persons the constitutional right of free speech. The right of free speech does not include, however, the right to use the facilities of radio without a license. The licensing system established by Congress in the Communications Act of 1934 was a proper exercise of its power over commerce. The standard it provided for the licensing of stations was the "public interest, convenience, or necessity." Denial of a station license on that ground, if valid under the Act, is not a denial of free speech.

A procedural point calls for just a word. The District Court, by granting the Government's motion for summary judgment, disposed of the case upon the pleadings and upon the record made before the Commission. The court below correctly held that its inquiry was limited to review of the evidence before the Commission. Trial de novo of the matters heard by the Commission and dealt with in its Report would have been improper. See Tagg Bros. v. United States, 280 U.S. 420; Acker v. United States, 298 U.S. 426.

Affirmed.

MURPHY, J., DISSENTING

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY, dissenting:

I do not question the objectives of the proposed regulations, and it is not my desire by narrow statutory interpretation to weaken the authority of government agencies to deal efficiently with matters committed to their jurisdiction by the Congress. Statutes of this kind should be construed so that the agency concerned may be able to cope effectively with problems which the Congress intended to correct, or may otherwise perform the functions given to it. But we exceed our competence when we gratuitously bestow upon an agency power which the Congress has not granted. Since that is what the Court in substance does today, I dissent.

In the present case we are dealing with a subject of extreme importance in the life of the nation. Although radio broadcasting, like the press, is generally conducted on a commercial basis, it is not an ordinary business activity, like the selling of securities or the marketing of electrical power. In the dissemination of information and opinion, radio has assumed a position of commanding importance, rivalling the press and the pulpit. Owing to its physical characteristics radio, unlike the other methods of conveying information, must be regulated and rationed by the government. Otherwise there would be chaos, and radio's usefulness would be largely destroyed. But because of its vast potentialities as a medium of communication, discussion and propaganda, the character and extent of control that should be exercised over it by the government is a matter of deep and vital concern. Events in Europe show that radio may readily be a weapon of authority and misrepresentation, instead of a means of entertainment and enlightenment. It may even be an instrument of oppression. In pointing out these possibilities I do not mean to intimate in the slightest that they are imminent or probable in this country, but they do suggest that the construction of the instant statute should be approached with more than ordinary restraint and caution, to avoid an interpretation that is not clearly justified by the conditions that brought about its enactment, or that would give the Commission greater powers than the Congress intended to confer.

The Communications Act of 1934 does not in terms give the Commission power to regulate the contractual relations between the stations and the networks. Columbia System v. United States, 316 U.S. 407, 416. It is only as an incident of the power to grant or withhold licenses to individual stations under §§ 307, 308, 309 and 310 that this authority is claimed,[6] except as it may have been provided by subdivisions (g), (i) and (r) of § 303, and by §§ 311 and 313. But nowhere in these sections, taken singly or collectively, is there to be found by reasonable construction or necessary inference, authority to regulate the broadcasting industry as such, or to control the complex operations of the national networks.

In providing for regulation of the radio, the Congress was under the necessity of vesting a considerable amount of discretionary authority in the Commission. The task of choosing between various claimants for the privilege of using the air waves is essentially an administrative one. Nevertheless, in specifying with some degree of particularity the kind of information to be included in an application for a license, the Congress has indicated what general conditions and considerations are to govern the granting and withholding of station licenses. Thus an applicant is required by § 308 (b) to submit information bearing upon his citizenship, character, and technical, financial and other qualifications to operate the proposed station, as well as data relating to the ownership and location of the proposed station, the power and frequencies desired, operating periods, intended use, and such other information as the Commission may require. Licenses, frequencies, hours of operation and power are to be fairly distributed among the several States and communities to provide efficient service to each. § 307 (b). Explicit provision is made for dealing with applicants and licensees who are found guilty, or who are under the control of persons found guilty of violating the federal anti-trust laws. §§ 311 and 313. Subject to the limitations defined in the Act, the Commission is required to grant a station license to any applicant "if public convenience, interest, or necessity will be served thereby." § 307(a). Nothing is said, in any of these sections, about network contracts, affiliations, or business arrangements.

The power to control network contracts and affiliations by means of the Commission's licensing powers cannot be derived from implication out of the standard of "public convenience, interest or necessity." We have held that: "the Act does not essay to regulate the business of the licensee. The Commission is given no supervisory control of the programs, of business management or of policy. In short, the broadcasting field is open to anyone, provided there be an available frequency over which he can broadcast without interference to others, if he shows his competency, the adequacy of his equipment, and financial ability to make good use of the assigned channel." Federal Communications Comm'n v. Sanders Radio Station, 309 U.S. 470, 475. The criterion of "public convenience, interest or necessity" is not an indefinite standard, but one to be "interpreted by its context, by the nature of radio transmission and reception, by the scope, character and quality of services, . . ." Federal Radio Comm'n v. Nelson Bros. Co., 289 U.S. 266, 285. Nothing in the context of which the standard is a part refers to network contracts. It is evident from the record that the Commission is making its determination of whether the public interest would be served by renewal of an existing license or licenses, not upon an examination of written applications presented to it, as required by §§ 308 and 309, but upon an investigation of the broadcasting industry as a whole, and general findings made in pursuance thereof which relate to the business methods of the network companies rather than the characteristics of the individual stations and the peculiar needs of the areas served by them. If it had been the intention of the Congress to invest the Commission with the responsibility, through its licensing authority, of exercising far-reaching control—as exemplified by the proposed regulations—over the business operations of chain broadcasting and radio networks as they were then or are now organized and established, it is not likely that the Congress would have left it to mere inference or implication from the test of "public convenience, interest or necessity," or that Congress would have neglected to include it among the considerations expressly made relevant to license applications by § 308 (b). The subject is one of such scope and importance as to warrant explicit mention. To construe the licensing sections (§§ 307, 308, 309, 310) as granting authority to require fundamental and revolutionary changes in the business methods of the broadcasting networks—methods which have been in existence for several years and which have not been adjudged unlawful—would inflate and distort their true meaning and extend them beyond the limited purposes which they were intended to serve.

[6] The regulations as first proposed were not connected with denial of applications for initial or renewal station licenses but provided instead that: "No licensee of a standard broadcast station shall enter into any contractual arrangement, express or implied, with a network organization," which contained any of the disapproved provisions. After a short time, however, the regulations were cast in their present form, making station licensing depend upon conformity with the regulations.

It is quite possible, of course, that maximum utilization of the radio as an instrument of culture, entertainment, and the diffusion of ideas is inhibited by existing network arrangements. Some of the conditions imposed by the broadcasting chains are possibly not conducive to a freer use of radio facilities, however essential they may be to the maintenance of sustaining programs and the operation of the chain broadcasting business as it is now conducted. But I am unable to agree that it is within the present authority of the Commission to prescribe the remedy for such conditions. It is evident that a correction of these conditions in the manner proposed by the regulations will involve drastic changes in the business of radio broadcasting which the Congress has not clearly and definitely empowered the Commission to undertake.

If this were a case in which a station license had been withheld from an individual applicant or licensee because of special relations or commitments that would seriously compromise or limit his ability to provide adequate service to the listening public, I should be less inclined to make any objection. As an incident of its authority to determine the eligibility of an individual applicant in an isolated case, the Commission might possibly consider such factors. In the present case, however, the Commission has reversed the order of things. Its real objective is to regulate the business practices of the major networks, thus bringing within the range of its regulatory power the chain broadcasting industry as a whole. By means of these regulations and the enforcement program, the Commission would not only extend its authority over business activities which represent interests and investments of a very substantial character, which have not been put under its jurisdiction by the Act, but would greatly enlarge its control over an institution that has now become a rival of the press and pulpit as a purveyor of news and entertainment and a medium of public discussion. To assume a function and responsibility of such wide reach and importance in the life of the nation, as a mere incident of its duty to pass on individual applications for permission to operate a radio station and use a specific wave length, is an assumption of authority to which I am not willing to lend my assent.

Again I do not question the need for regulation in this field, or the authority of the Congress to enact legislation that would vest in the Commission such power as it requires to deal with the problem, which it has defined and analyzed in its report with admirable lucidity. It is possible that the remedy indicated by the proposed regulations is the appropriate one, whatever its effect may be on the sustaining programs, advertising contracts, and other characteristics of chain broadcasting as it is now conducted in this country. I do not believe, however, that the Commission was justified in claiming the responsibility and authority it has assumed to exercise without a clear mandate from the Congress.

An examination of the history of this legislation convinces me that the Congress did not intend by anything in § 303, or any other provision of the Act, to confer on the Commission the authority it has assumed to exercise by the issuance of these regulations. Section 303 is concerned primarily with technical matters, and the subjects of regulation authorized by most of its subdivisions are exceedingly specific—so specific in fact that it is reasonable to infer that, if Congress had intended to cover the subject of network contracts and affiliations, it would not have left it to dubious implications from general clauses, lifted out of context, in subdivisions (g), (i) and (r). I am unable to agree that in authorizing the Commisison in § 303 (g) to study new uses for radio, provide for experimental use of frequencies, and "generally encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest," it was the intention or the purpose of the Congress to confer on the Commisison the regulatory powers now being asserted. Manifestly that subdivision dealt with experimental and development work—technical and scientific matters, and the construction of its concluding clause should be accordingly limited to those considerations. Nothing in its legislative history suggests that it had any broader purpose.

It was clearly not the intention of the Congress by the enactment of § 303(i), authorizing the Commission "to make special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting," to invest the Commission with the authority now claimed over network contracts. This section is a verbatim re-enactment of § 4(h) of the Radio Act of 1927, and had its origin in a Senate amendment to the bill which became that Act. In its original form it provided that the Commission, from time to time, as public convenience, interest, or necessity required, should:

"When stations are connected by wire for chain broadcasting, [the Commission should] determine the power each station shall use and the wave lengths to be used during the time stations are so connected and so operated, and make all other regulations necessary in the interest of equitable radio service to the listeners in the communities or areas affected by chain broadcasting."

It was evidently the purpose of this provision to remedy a situation that was described as follows by Senator Dill (who was in charge of the bill in the Senate) in questioning a witness at the hearings of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce:

" * * * During the past few months there has grown up a system of chain broadcasting, extending over the United States a great deal of the time. I say a great deal of the time—many nights a month—and the stations that are connected are of such widely varying meter lengths that the ordinary radio set that reaches out any distance is unable to get anything but that one program, and so, in effect, that one program monopolizes the air. I realize it is somewhat of a technical engineering problem, but it has seemed to many people, at least many who have written to me, that when stations are carrying on chain programs that they might be limited to the use of wave lengths adjoining or near enough to one another that they would not cover the entire dial. I do not know whether legislation ought to restrict that or whether it had better be done by regulations of the department. I want to get your opinion as to the advisability in some way protecting people who want to hear some other program than the one being broadcasted by chain broadcast." (Report of Hearings Before Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on S. 1 and S. 1754, 69th Cong., 1st Sess. (1926) p. 123.)

In other words, when the same program was simultaneously broadcast by chain stations, the weaker independent stations were drowned out because of the high power of the chain stations. With the receiving sets then commonly in use, listeners were unable to get any program except the chain program. It was essentially an interference problem. In addition to determining power and wave length for chain stations, it would have been the duty of the Commission, under the amendment, to make other regulations necessary for "equitable radio service to the listeners in the communities or areas affected by chain broadcasting." The last clause should not be interpreted out of context and without relation to the problem at which the amendment was aimed. It is reasonably construed as simply authorizing the Commission to remedy other technical problems of interference involved in chain broadcasting in addition to power and wave length by requiring special types of equipment, controlling locations, etc. The statement in the Senate Committee Report that this provision gave the Commission "complete authority * * * to control chain broadcasting" (S. Rep. No. 772, 69th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 3) must be taken as meaning that the provision gave complete authority with respect to the specific problem which the Senate intended to meet, a problem of technical interference.

While the form of the amendment was simplified in the Conference Committee so as to authorize the Commission "to make special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting," both Houses were assured in the report of the Conference Committee that "the jurisdiction conferred in this paragraph is substantially the same as the jurisdiction conferred upon the Commission by . . . the Senate amendment." (Sen. Doc. No. 200, 69th Conf., 2d Sess., p. 17; H. Rep. No. 1886, 69th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 17). This is further borne out by a statement of Senator Dill in discussing the conference report on the Senate floor:

"What is happening today is that the National Broadcasting Co., which is a part of the great Radio Trust, to say the least, if not a monopoly, is hooking up stations in every community on their various wave lengths with high powered stations and sending one program out, and they are forcing the little stations off the board so that the people cannot hear anything except the one program.

"There is no power today in the hands of the Department of Commerce to stop that practice. The radio commission will have the power to regulate and prevent it and give the independents a chance." (68 Cong. Rec. 3031.)

Section 303(r) is certainly no basis for inferring that the Commission is empowered to issue the challenged regulations. This subdivision is not an independent grant of power, but only an authorization to: "Make such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act." There is no provision in the Act for the control of network contractual arrangements by the Commission. and consequently § 303(r) is of no consequence here.

To the extent that existing network practices may have run counter to the anti-trust laws, the Congress has expressly provided the means of dealing with the problem. The enforcement of those laws has been committed to the courts and other law enforcement agencies. In addition to the usual penalties prescribed by statute for their violation, however, the Commission has been expressly authorized by § 311 to refuse a station license to any person "finally adjudged guilty by a Federal court" of attempting unlawfully to monopolize radio communication. Anyone under the control of such a person may also be refused a license. And whenever a court has ordered the revocation of an existing license, as expressly provided in § 313, a new license may not be granted by the Commission to the guilty party or to any person under his control. In my opinion these provisions (§§ 311 and 313) clearly do not and were not intended to confer independent authority on the Commission to supervise network contracts or to enforce competition between radio networks by withholding licenses from stations, and do not justify the Commission in refusing a license to an applicant otherwise qualified, because of business arrangements that may constitute an unlawful restraint of trade, when the applicant has not been finally adjudged guilty of violating the anti-trust laws, and is not controlled by one so adjudged.

The conditions disclosed by the Commission's investigation, if they require correction, should be met, not by the invention of authority where none is available or by diverting existing powers out of their true channels and using them for purposes to which they were not addressed, but by invoking the aid of the Congress or the service of agencies that have been entrusted with the enforcement of the anti-trust laws. In other fields of regulation the Congress has made clear its intentions. It has not left to mere inference and guess-work the existence of authority to order board changes and reforms in the national economy or the structure of business arrangements in the Public Utility Holding Company Act, 49 Stat. 803, the Securities Act of 1933, 48 Stat. 74, the Federal Power Act, 49 Stat. 838, and other measures of similar character. Indeed the Communications Act itself contains cogent internal evidence that Congress did not intend to grant power over network contractual arrangements to the Commission. In § 215 (c) of Title II, dealing with common carriers by wire and radio, Congress provided:

"The Commission shall examine all contracts of common carriers subject to this Act which prevent the other party thereto from dealing with another common carrier subject to this Act, and shall report its findings to Congress, together with its recommendations as to whether additional legislation on this subject is desirable."

Congress had no difficulty here in expressing the possible desirability of regulating a type of contract roughly similar to the ones with which we are now concerned, and in reserving to itself the ultimate decision upon the matters of policy involved. Insofar as the Congress deemed it necessary in this legislation to safeguard radio broadcasting against arrangements that are offensive to the antitrust laws or monopolistic in nature, it made specific provision in §§ 311 and 313. If the existing network contracts are deemed objectionable because of monopolistic or other features, and no remedy is presently available under these provisions, the proper course is to seek amendatory legislation from the Congress, not to fabricate authority by ingenious reasoning based upon provisions that have no true relation to the specific problem.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(No. 66.—October Term, 1970)

GEORGE A. ROSENBLOOM, PETITIONER v. METROMEDIA, INC.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit

[June 7, 1971]

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN announced the judgment of the Court and an opinion in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE and MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN join.

In a series of cases beginning with New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), the Court has considered the limitations upon state libel laws imposed by the constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and of the press. New York Times held that in a civil libel action by a public official against a newspaper those guarantees required clear and convincing proof that a defamatory falsehood alleged as libel was uttered with "knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." Id., at 280. The same requirement was later held to apply to "public figures" who sued in libel on the basis of alleged defamatory falsehoods. The several cases considered since New York Times involved actions of "public officials" or "public figures," usually, but not always, against newspapers or magazines.[1] Common to all the cases was a defamatory falsehood in the report of an event of "public or general interest."[2] The instant case presents the question whether the New York Times' knowing or reckless falsity standard applies in a state civil libel action brought not by a "public official" or a "public figure" but by a private individual for a defamatory falsehood uttered in a news broadcast by a radio station about the individual's involvement in an event of public or general interest.[3] The District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania held that the New York Times standard did not apply and that Pennsylvania law determined respondent's liability in this diversity case, 289 F. Supp. 737 (1968). The Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit held that the New York Times standard did apply and reversed the judgment for damages awarded to petitioner by the jury. 415 F. 2d 892 (1969). We granted certiorari, 397 U.S. 904 (1970). We agree with the Court of Appeals and affirm that court's judgment.

In 1963, petitioner was a distributor of nudist magazines in the Philadelphia metropolitan area. During the fall of that year, in response to citizen complaints, the Special Investigations Squad of the Philadelphia Police Department initiated a series of enforcement actions under the city's obscenity laws. The police, under the command of Captain Ferguson, purchased various magazines from more than 20 newsstands throughout the city. Based upon Captain Ferguson's determination that the magazines were obscene,[4] police on October 1, 1963, arrested most of the newsstand operators[5] on charges of selling obscene material. While the police were making an arrest at one newsstand, petitioner arrived to deliver some of his nudist magazines and was immediately arrested along with the newsboy.[6] Three days later, on October 4, the police obtained a warrant to search petitioner's home and the rented barn he used as a warehouse, and seized the inventory of magazines and books found at these locations. Upon learning of the seizures, petitioner, who had been released on bail after his first arrest, surrendered to the police and was arrested for a second time.

Assn.* v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970) (state representative and real estate developer against publisher of newspaper); Ocala Star-Banner Company v. Damron, —— U.S. —— (1971) (defeated candidate for tax assessor against publisher of newspaper); Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, —— U.S. —— (1971) (candidate for United States Senate against publisher of newspaper); Time, Inc. v. Pape, —— U.S. —— (1971) (police official against publisher of magazine). However, Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (1966), involved an action against a newspaper columnist by a former county recreation area supervisor; St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727 (1968), involved an action of a deputy sheriff against a defeated candidate for the United States Senate; and Linn v. Plant Guard Workers, 383 U.S. 53 (1966), involved an action by an official of an employer against a labor union.

Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64 (1964), held that the New York Times standard measured also the constitutional restriction upon state power to impose criminal sanctions for criticism of the official conduct of public officials. The Times standard of proof has also been required to support the dismissal of a public school teacher based on false statements made by the teacher in discussing issues of public importance. Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968). The same test was applied to suits for invasion of privacy based on false statements where, again, a matter of public interest was involved. Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967). The opinion in that case expressly reserved the question presented here whether the test applied in a libel action brought by a private individual. Id., at 391.

[2] This term is from Warren and Brandeis, The Right to Privacy, 4 Harv. L. Rev. 193, 214 (1890). Our discussion of matters of "public or general interest" appears in Part IV, infra, of this opinion.

[3] Petitioner does not question that the First Amendment guarantees of freedom of speech and freedom of the press apply to respondent's newscasts.

Following the second arrest, Captain Ferguson telephoned respondent's radio station WIP and another local radio station, a wire service, and a local newspaper to inform them of the raid on petitioner's home and of his arrest. WIP broadcast news reports every half hour to the Philadelphia metropolitan area. These news programs ran either five or ten minutes and generally contained from six to twenty different items that averaged about thirty seconds each. WIP's 6 p. m. broadcast on October 4, 1963, included the following item:

> "City Cracks Down on Smut Merchants
> "The Special Investigations Squad raided the home of George Rosenbloom in the 1800 block of Vesta Street this afternoon. Police confiscated 1,000 allegedly obscene books at Rosenbloom's home and arrested him on charges of possession of obscene literature. The Special Investigations Squad also raided a barn in the 20 hundred block of Welsh Road near Bustleton Avenue and confiscated 3,000 obscene books. Capt. Ferguson says he believes they have hit the supply of a main distributor of obscene material in Philadelphia."

This report was re-broadcast in substantially the same form at 6:30 p.m., but at 8 p.m. when the item was broadcast for the third time, WIP corrected the third sentence to read "reportedly obscene." News of petitioner's arrest was broadcast five more times in the following twelve hours, but each report described the seized books as "allegedly" or "reportedly" obscene. From October 5 to October 21, WIP broadcast no further reports relating to petitioner.

On October 16 petitioner brought an action in Federal District Court against various city and police officials and against several local news media.[7] The suit alleged that the magazines petitioner distributed were not obscene and sought injunctive relief prohibiting further police interference with his business as well as further publicity of the earlier arrests. The second series of allegedly defamatory broadcasts related to WIP's news reports of the law suit. There were ten broadcasts on October 21, two on October 25, and one on November 1. None mentioned petitioner by name. The first at 6:30 a.m. on October 21 was pretty much like those that followed:

> "Federal District Judge Lord, will hear arguments today from two publishers and a distributor all seeking an injunction against Philadelphia Police Commissioner Howard Leary . . . District Attorney James C. Crumlish . . . a local television station and a newspaper . . . ordering them to lay off the smut literature racket.
> "The girlie-book peddlers say the police crackdown and continued reference to their borderline literature as smut or filth is hurting their business. Judge Lord refused to issue a temporary injunction when he was first approached. Today he'll decide the issue. It will set a precedent . . . and if the injunction is not granted . . . it could signal an even more intense effort to rid the city of pornography."

On October 27, petitioner went to WIP's studios after hearing from a friend that the station had broadcast news about his lawsuit. Using a lobby telephone to talk with a part-time newscaster, petitioner inquired what stories WIP had broadcast about him. The newscaster asked him to be more specific about dates and times. Petitioner then asked for the noon news broadcast on October 21.

[4] At trial, Captain Ferguson testified that his definition of obscenity was "anytime the private parts is showing of the female or the private parts is shown of males."

[5] Several more newsstand operators were arrested between October 1 and October 4.

[6] The record neither confirms nor refutes petitioner's contention that his arrest was fortuitous. Nor does the record reflect whether or not petitioner's magazines were the subject either of the original citizens' complaints or of the initial police purchases.

[7] The complaint named as defendants the publishers of two newspapers, a television station, the city of Philadelphia, and the district attorney, but not respondent WIP. The plaintiffs were petitioner, the partnership of himself and his wife which carried on the business, and the publisher of the nudist magazines which he distributed.

1963, which the newcaster read to him over the phone; it was similar to the above 6:30 a.m. broadcast. According to petitioner, the ensuing interchange was brief. Petitioner told the newscaster that his magazines were "found to be completely legal and legitimate by the United States Supreme Court." When the newscatser replied the district attorney had said the magazines were obscene, petitioner countered that he had a public statement of the district attorney declaring the magazines legal. At that point, petitioner testified, "the telephone conversation was terminated—he just hung up." Petitioner apparently made no request for a retraction or correction, and none was forthcoming. WIP's final report on petitioner's lawsuit—the only one after petitioner's unsatisfactory conversation at the station—occurred on November 1 after the station had checked the story with the judge involved.[8]

II

In May 1964 a jury acquitted petitioner in state court of the criminal obscenity charges under instructions of the trial judge that, as a matter of law, the nudist magazines distributed by petitioner were not obscene. Following his acquittal, petitioner filed this diversity action in District Court seeking damages under Pensylvania's libel law. Petitioner alleged that WIP's unqualified characterization of the books seized as "obscene" in the 6 and 6:30 p.m. broadcasts of October 4, describing his arrest, constituted libel per se and was proved false by petitioner's subsequent acquittal. In addition, he alleged that the broadcasts in the second series describing his court suit for injunctive relief were also false and defamatory in that WIP characterized petitioner and his business associates as "smut distributors" and "girlie book peddlers" and, further, falsely characterized the suit as an attempt to force the defendants "to lay off the smut literature racket."

At the trial WIP's defenses were truth and privilege. WIP's news director testified that his eight-man staff of reporters prepared their own newscasts and broadcast their material themselves, and that material for the news programs usually came either from the wire services or from telephone tips. None of the writers or broadcasters involved in preparing the broadcasts in this case testified. The news director's recollection was that the primary source of information for the first series of broadcasts about petitioner's arrest was Captain Ferguson, but that, to the director's knowledge, the station did not have any further verification. Captain Ferguson testified that he had informed WIP and other media of the police action and that WIP had accurately broadcast what he told the station. The evidence regarding WIP's investigation of petitioner's law suit in the second series of broadcasts was even more sparse. The news director testified that he was "sure we would check with the District Attorney's office also and with the police department," but "it would be difficult to state what additional corroboration we had." In general, he testified that WIP's half-hour deadlines required it to rely on wire-service copy and oral reports from previously reliable sources subject to the general policy that "we will contact as many sources as we possibly can on any kind of story."

Pennsylvania's libel law tracks almost precisely the Restatement (First) of Torts provisions on the subject. Pennsylvania holds actionable any unprivileged "malicious"[9] publication of matter which tends to harm a person's reputation and expose him to public hatred, contempt or ridicule. Schnabel v. Meredith, 378 Pa. 609, 107 A. 2d 860 (1954); Restatement of Torts §§ 558, 559. Pennsylvania law recognizes truth as a complete defense to a libel action. Schonek v. WJAC, Inc., 436 Pa. 78, 84, 258 A. 2d 504, 507 (1969); Restatement of Torts § 582. It recognizes an absolute immunity for defamatory statements made by high state officials, even if published with an improper motive, actual malice, or knowing falsity. Montgomery v. Philadelphia, 392 Pa. 178, 140 A. 2d 100 (1958); Restatement of Torts § 591; and it recognizes a conditional privilege for news media to report judicial, administrative, or legislative proceedings if the account is fair and accurate, and not published solely for the purpose of causing harm to the person defamed, even though the official information is false or inaccurate. Sciandra v. Lynett, 409 Pa. 595, 187 A. 2d 586, 588–589 (1963); Restatement of Torts § 611. The conditional privilege of the news media may be defeated, however, by " 'want of reasonable care and diligence to ascertain the truth, before giving currency to an untrue communication.' The failure to employ such 'reasonable care and diligence' can destroy a privilege which otherwise would protect the utterer of the communication." Purcell v. Westinghouse Broadcasting Co., 411 Pa. 167, 179, 191 A. 2d 662, 668 (1963). Pennsylvania has also enacted verbatim the Restatement's provisions on burden of proof, which place the burden of proof for the affirmative defenses of truth and privilege upon the defendant.[10]

[8] The text of the final broadcast read as follows:
"U.S. District Judge John Lord told WIP news just before airtime that it may be another week before he will be able to render a decision as to whether he has jurisdiction in the case of two publishers and a distributor who wish to restrain the D.A.'s office, the police chief, a TV station and the Bulletin for either making alleged raids of their publications, considered smut and immoral literature by the defendants named, or publicizing that they are in that category. Judge Lord then will be in a position to rule on injunction proceedings asked by the publishers and distributor claiming the loss of business in their operations."

[9] The reference here, of course, is to common law "malice," not to the constitutional standard of New York Times v. Sullivan, supra. See n. 18, post.

At the close of the evidence, the District Court denied respondent's motion for a directed verdict and charged the jury, in conformity with Pennsylvania law, that four findings were necessary to return a verdict for petitioner: (1) that one or more of the broadcasts were defamatory; (2) that a reasonable listener would conclude that the defamatory statement referred to petitioner; (3) that WIP had forfeited its privilege to report official proceedings fairly and accurately, either because it intended to injure the plaintiff personally or because it exercised the privilege unreasonably and without reasonable care; and (4) that the reporting was false. The jury was instructed that petitioner had the burden of proof on the first three issues, but that respondent had the burden of proving that the reporting was true. The jury was further instructed that "as a matter of law" petitioner was not entitled to actual damages claimed for loss of business "not because it wouldn't ordinarily be but because there has been evidence that this same subject matter was the subject" of broadcasts over other television and radio stations and of newspaper reports, "so if there was any business lost . . . we have no proof . . . that [it] resulted directly from the broadcasts by WIP . . . ."App., at 331a. On the question of punitive damages, the judge gave the following instruction:

> "if you find that this publication arose from a bad motive or malice toward the plaintiff, or if you find that it was published with reckless indifference to the truth, if you find that it was not true, you would be entitled to award punitive damages, and punitive damages are awarded as a deterrent from future conduct of the same sort.
> "They really are awarded for outrageous conduct, as I have said, with a bad motive or with reckless disregard of the interests of others, and before you would award punitive damages you must find that these broadcasts were published with a bad motive or with reckless disregard of the rights of others, of reckless indifference to the rights of others . . . ."

The jury returned a verdict for petitioner and awarded $25,000 in general damages, and $725,000 in punitive damages. The District Court reduced the punitive damages award to $250,000 on remittitur, but denied respondent's motion for judgment n. o. v. In reversing, the Court of Appeals emphasized that the broadcasts concerned matters of public interest and that they involved "hot news" prepared under deadline pressure. The Court of Appeals concluded that "the fact that plaintiff was not a public figure cannot be accorded decisive significance if the recognized important guarantees of the First Amendment are to be adequately implemented." 415 F. 2d, at 896. For that reason, the court held that the New York Times standard applied and further directed that judgment be entered for respondent, holding that, as a matter of law, petitioner's evidence did not meet that standard.

[10] 12 Purdon's Pa. Stat. Ann. § 1584a (Supp. 1971) provides:

"(1) In an action for defamation, the plaintiff has the burden of proving, when the issue is properly raised:

"(a) The defamatory character of the communication;

"(b) Its publication by the defendant;

"(c) Its application to the plaintiff;

"(d) The recipient's understanding of its defamatory meaning;

"(e) The recipient's understanding of it as intended to be applied to the plaintiff;

"(f) Special harm resulting to the plaintiff from its publication;

"(g) Abuse of a conditionally privileged occasion.

"(2) In an action for defamation, the defendant has the burden of proving, when the issue is properly raised:

"(a) The truth of the defamatory communication;

"(b) The privileged character of the occasion on which it was published;

"(c) The character of the subject matter of defamatory comment as of public concern." See Restatement of Torts § 613.

IV

Petitioner concedes that the police campaign to enforce the obscenity laws was an issue of public interest, and, therefore, that the constitutional guarantees for freedom of speech and press imposed limits upon Pennsylvania's power to apply its libel laws to compel respondent to compensate him in damages for the alleged defamatory falsehoods broadcast about his involvement. As noted, the narrow question he raises is whether, because he is not a "public official" or a "public figure" but a private individual, those limits required that he prove that the falsehoods resulted from a failure of respondent to exercise reasonable care, or required that he prove that the falsehoods were broadcast with knowledge of their falsity or with reckless disregard of whether they were false or not. That question must be answered against the background of the functions of the constitutional guarantees for freedom of expression. Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, at 84–85, n. 10 (1966).

Self-governance in the United States presupposes far more than knowledge and debate about the strictly official activities of various levels of government. The commitment of the country to the institution of private property, protected by the Due Process and Just Compensation Clauses in the Constitution, places in private hands vast areas of economic and social power that vitally affect the nature and quality of life in the Nation. Our efforts to live and work together in a free society not completely dominated by governmental regulation necessarily encompass far more than politics in a narrow sense. "The guarantees for speech and press are not the preserve of political expression or comment upon public affairs." Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S., at 388. "Freedom of discussion, if it would fulfill its historic function in this nation, must embrace all issues about which information is needed or appropriate to enable the members of society to cope with exigencies of their period." Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 102 (1941).

Although the limitations upon civil libel actions, first held in New York Times to be required by the First Amendment, were applied in that case in the context of defamatory falsehoods about the official conduct of a public official, later decisions have disclosed the artificiality, in terms of the public's interest, of a simple distinction between "public" and "private" individuals or institutions: "Increasingly in this country, the distinctions between governmental and private sectors are blurred. . . . In many situations, policy determinations which traditionally were channeled through formal political institutions are now originated and implemented through a complex array of boards, committees, commissions, corporations, and associations, some only loosely connected with the Government. This blending of positions and power has also occurred in the case of individuals so that many who do not hold public office at the moment are nevertheless intimately involved in the resolution of important public questions. . . .

". . . Our citizenry has a legitimate and substantial interest in the conduct of such persons, and freedom of the press to engage in uninhibited debate about their involvement in public issues and events is as crucial as it is in the case of 'public officials.'" Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S., at 163–164 (concurring opinion of Warren, C. J.).

Moreover, the constitutional protection was not intended to be limited to matters bearing broadly on issues of responsible government. "[T]he Founders . . . felt that a free press would advance 'truth, science, morality, and arts in general' as well as responsible government." Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S., at 147 (opinion of HARLAN, J.). Comments in other cases reiterate this judgment that the First Amendment extends to myriad matters of public interest. In Time, Inc. v. Hill, supra, we had "no doubt that the . . . opening of a new play linked to an actual incident, is a matter of public interest." 385 U.S., at 388, which was entitled to constitutional protection. Butts held that an alleged "fix" of a college football game was a public issue. Associated Press v. Walker, a companion case to Butts, established that the public had a similar interest in the events and personalities involved in federal efforts to enforce a court decree ordering the enrollment of a Negro student in the University of Mississippi. Thus, these cases underscore the vitality, as well as the scope, of the "profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S., at 270–271 (emphasis added).

If a matter is a subject of public or general interest, it cannot suddenly become less so merely because a private individual is involved, or because in some sense the individual did not "voluntarily" choose to become involved. The public's primary interest is in the event; the public focus is on the conduct of the participant and the content, effect, and significance of the conduct, not the participant's prior anonymity or notoriety.[11] The present case illustrates the point. The community has a vital interest in the proper enforcement of its criminal laws, particularly in an area such as obscenity where a number of highly important values are potentially in conflict: the public has an interest both in seeing that the criminal law is adequately enforced and in assuring that the law is not used unconstitutionally to suppress free expression. Whether the person involved is a famous large scale magazine distributor or a "private" businessman running a corner newsstand has no relevance in ascertaining whether the public has an interest in the issue. We honor the commitment to robust debate on public issues, which is embodied in the First Amendment, by extending constitutional protection to all discussion and communication involving matters of public or general concern, without regard to whether the persons involved are famous or anonymous.[12]

Our Brother WHITE agrees that the protection afforded by the First Amendment depends upon whether the issue involved in the publication is an issue of public or general concern. He would, however, confine our holding to the situation raised by the facts in this case, that is, limit it to issues involving "official actions of public servants." In our view that might be misleading. It is clear that there has emerged from our cases decided since New York Times the concept that the First Amendment's impact upon state libel laws derives not so much from whether the plaintiff is a "public official," "public figure," or "private individual," as it derives from the question whether the allegedly defamatory publication concerns a matter of public or general interest. See T. Emerson, "The System of Freedom of Expression" 531–532, 540 (1970). In that circumstance we think the time has come forthrightly to announce that the determinant whether the First Amendment applies to state libel actions is whether the utterance involved concerns an issue of public or general concern, albeit leaving the delineation of the reach of that term to future cases. As our Brother WHITE observes, that is not a problem in this case, since police arrest of a person for distributing allegedly obscene magazines clearly constitutes an issue of public or general interest.[13]

V

We turn then to the question to be decided. Petitioner's argument that the Constitution should be held to require that the private individual prove only that the publisher failed to exercise "reasonable care" in publishing defamatory falsehoods proceeds along two lines. First he argues that the private individual, unlike the public figure, does not have access to the media to counter the defamatory material and that the private individual, unlike the public figure, has not assumed the risk of defamation by thrusting himself into the public arena. Second, petitioner focuses on the important values served by the law of defamation in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation.

[11] For example, the public's interest in the provocative speech that was made during the tense episode on the campus of the University of Mississippi would certainly have been the same in Associated Press v. Walker, n. 1, supra, if the speaker had been an anonymous student and not a well-known retired Army General. Walker also illustrates another anomaly of focusing analysis on the public "figure" or public "official" status of the individual involved. General Walker's fame stemmed from events completely unconnected with the episode in Mississippi. It seems particularly unsatisfactory to determine the extent of First Amendment protection on the basis of factors completely unrelated to the newsworthy events being reported. See also Greenbelt Pub. Ass'n v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970).

[12] We are not to be understood as implying that no area of a person's activities falls outside the area of public or general interest. We expressly leave open the question of what constitutional standard of proof, if any, controls the enforcement of state libel laws for defamatory falsehoods published or broadcast by news media about a person's activities not within the area of public or general interest.

We also intimate no view on the extent of constitutional protection, if any, for purely commercial communications made in the course of business. See Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942). Compare Breard v. Alexander, 341 U.S. 622 (1951), with Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141 (1943). But see New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 265–266 (1964); Linn v. Local 114, Plant Guard Workers, 383 U.S. 53 (1966).

[13] Our Brother WHITE states in his opinion "The First Amendment gives . . . the privilege to report . . . the official actions of public servants in full detail, with no requirement that . . . the privacy of an individual involved in . . . the official action be spared from public view." Post, at - --. This seems very broad. It implies a privilege to report, for example such confidential records as those of juvenile court proceedings.

We have recognized the force of petitioner's arguments, Time, Inc. v. Hill, supra, at 391, and we adhere to the caution expressed in that case against "blind application" of the New York Times standard. Id., at 390. Analysis of the particular factors involved, however, convinces us that petitioner's arguments cannot be reconciled with the purposes of the First Amendment, with our cases, and with the traditional doctrines of libel law itself. Drawing a distinction between "public" and "private" figures makes no sense in terms of the First Amendment guarantees.[14] The New York Times standard was applied to libel of a public official or public figure to give effect to the Amendment's function to encourage ventilation of public issues, not because the public official has any less interest in protecting his reputation than an individual in private life. While the argument that public figures need less protection because they can command media attention to counter criticism may be true for some very prominent people, even then it is the rare case where the denial overtakes the original charge. Denials, retractions, and corrections are not "hot" news, and rarely receive the prominence of the original story. When the public official or public figure is a minor functionary, or has left the position which put him in the public eye, see Rosenblatt v. Baer, supra, the argument loses all of its force. In the vast majority of libels involving public officials or public figures, the ability to respond through the media will depend on the same complex factor on which the ability of a private individual depends: the unpredictable event of the media's continuing interest in the story. Thus the unproven, and highly improbable, generalization that an as yet undefined class of "public figures" involved in matters of public concern will be better able to respond through the media than private individuals also involved in such matters seems too insubstantial a reed on which to rest a constitutional distinction. Furthermore, in First Amendment terms, the cure seems far worse than the disease. If the States fear that private citizens will not be able to respond adequately to publicity involving them, the solution lies in the direction of ensuring their ability to respond, rather than in stifling public discussion of matters of public concern.[15]

Further reflection over the years since New York Times was decided persuades us that the view of the "public official" or "public figure" as assuming the risk of defamation by voluntarily thrusting himself into the public eye bears little relationship either to the values protected by the First Amendment or to the nature of our society. We have recognized that "[e]xposure of the self to others in varying degrees is a concomitant of life in a civilized community." Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 388 (1967). Voluntarily or not, we are all "public" men to some degree. Conversely, some aspects of the lives of even the most public men fall outside the area of matters of public or general concern. See n. 12, supra; Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965).[16] Thus, the idea that certain "public" figures have voluntarily exposed their entire lives to public inspection, while private individuals have kept theirs carefully shrouded from public view is, at best, a legal fiction. In any event, such a distinction could easily produce the paradoxical result of dampening discussion of issues of public or general concern because they happen to involve private citizens while extending constitutional encouragement to discussion of aspects of the lives of "public figures" which are not in the area of public or general concern.

[15] Some States have adopted retraction statutes or right of reply of statutes. See Donnelly, The Right of Reply: An Alternative to an Action for Libel, 34 Va. L. Rev. 867 (1948); Note Vindication of the Reputation of a Public Official, 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1730 (1967). Cf. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

One writer, in arguing that the First Amendment itself should be read to guarantee a right of access to the media not limited to a right to respond to defamatory falsehoods, has suggested several ways the law might encourage public discussion. Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1641, 1666–1678 (1967). It is important to recognize that the private individual often desires press exposure either for himself, his ideas, or his causes. Constitutional adjudication must take into account the individual's interest in access to the press as well as the individual's interest in preserving his reputation, even though libel actions by their nature encourage a narrow view of the individual's interest since they focus only on situations where the individual has been harmed by undesired press attention. A constitutional rule that deters the press from covering the ideas or activities of the private individual thus conceives the individual's interest too narrowly.

[16] This is not the less true because the area of public concern in the cases of candidates for public office and of elected public officials is broad. See Monitor Patriot Company v. Roy, —— U.S. —— (1971).

General references to the values protected by the law of libel conceal important distinctions. Traditional arguments suggest that libel law protects two separate interests of the individual: first, his desire to preserve a certain privacy around his personality from unwarranted intrusion, and, second a desire to preserve his public good name and reputation. See Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 92 (1966) (concurring opinion of STEWART, J.). The individual's interest in privacy—in preventing unwarranted intrusion upon the private aspects of his life—is not involved in this case, or even in the class of cases under consideration, since, by hypothesis, the individual is involved in matters of public or general concern.[17] In the present case, however, petitioner's business reputation is involved, and thus the relevant interests protected by state libel law are petitioner's public reputation and good name.

These are important interests. Consonant with the libel laws of most of the States, however, Pennsylvania's libel law subordinates these interests of the individual in a number of circumstances. Thus, high government officials are immune from liability—absolutely privileged—even if they publish defamatory material from an improper motive, with actual malice, and with knowledge of its falsity. Montgomery v. Philadelphia, 392 Pa. 178, 140 A. 2d 100 (1958). This absolute privilege attaches to judges, attorneys at law in connection with a judicial proceeding, parties and witnesses to judicial proceedings, Congressmen and state legislators, and high national and state executive officials. Restatement of Torts §§ 585–592. Moreover, a conditional privilege allows newspapers to report the false defamatory material originally published under the absolute privileges listed above, if done accurately. Sciandra v. Lynett, 409 Pa. 595, 187 A. 586 (1963).

Even without the presence of a specific constitutional command, therefore, Pennsylvania libel law recognizes that society's interest in protecting individual reputation often yields to other important social goals. In this case, the vital needs of freedom of the press and freedom of speech persuade us that allowing private citizens to obtain damage judgments on the basis of a jury determination that a publisher probably failed to use reasonable care would not provide adequate "breathing space" for these great freedoms. Reasonable care in an "elusive standard" which "would place on the press the intolerable burden of guessing how a jury might assess the reasonableness of steps taken by it to verify the accuracy of every reference to a name, picture or portrait." Time, Inc. v. Hill, supra, 385 U.S., at 389. Fear of guessing wrong must inevitably cause self-censorship and thus create the danger that the legitimate utterance will be deterred. Cf. Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 526 (1958).

Moreover, we ordinarily decide civil litigation by the preponderance of the evidence. Indeed, the judge instructed the jury to decide the present case on that standard. In the normal civil suit where this standard is employed, "we view it as to no more serious in general for there to be an erroneous verdict in the defendant's favor than for there to be an erroneous verdict in the plaintiff's favor." In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 371 (1970) (concurring opinion of HARLAN, J.). In libel cases, however, we view an erroneous verdict for the plaintiff as most serious. Not only does it mulct the defendant for an innocent misstatement—the three-quarter-million-dollar jury verdict in this case could rest on such an error—but the possibility of such error, even beyond the vagueness of the negligence standard itself, would create a strong impetus toward self-censorship, which the First Amendment cannot tolerate. These dangers for freedom of speech and press led us to reject the reasonable-man standard of liability as "simply inconsistent" with our national commitment under the First Amendment when sought to be applied to the conduct of a political campaign. Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, — U.S. —, — (1971). The same considerations lead us to reject that standard here.

[17] Our Brothers HARLAN and MARSHALL would not limit the application of the First Amendment to private libels involving issues of general or public interest. They would hold that the Amendment covers all private libels at least where state law permits the defense of truth. The Court has not yet had occasion to consider the impact of the First Amendment on the application of state libel laws to libels where no issue of general or public interest is involved. See n. 1, supra. However, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), recognized a constitutional right to privacy and at least one commentator has discussed the relation of that right to the First Amendment. T. Emerson, supra, 544–562. Since all agree that this case involves an issue of public or general interest, we have no occasion to discuss that relationship. See n. 12, supra. We do not, however, share the doubts of our Brothers HARLAN and MARSHALL that courts would be unable to identify interests in privacy and dignity. The task may be difficult but not more so than other tasks in this field.

We are aware that the press has, on occasion, grossly abused the freedom it is given by the Constitution. All must deplore such excesses. In an ideal world, the responsibility of the press would match the freedom and public trust given it. But from the earliest days of our history, this free society, dependent as it is for its survival upon a vigorous free press, has tolerated some abuse. In 1799, James Madison wrote:

> " 'Among those principles deemed sacred in America, among those sacred rights considered as forming the bulwark of their liberty, which the Government contemplates with awful reverence and would approach only with the most cautious circumspection, there is no one of which the importance is more deeply impressed on the public mind than the liberty of the press. That this liberty is often carried to excess; that it has sometimes degenerated into licentiousness, is seen and lamented, but the remedy has not yet been discovered. Perhaps it is an evil inseparable from the good with which it is allied; perhaps it is a shoot which cannot be stripped from the stalk without wounding vitally the plant from which it is torn. However desirable those measures might be which might correct without enslaving the press, they have never yet been devised in America.' " VI Writings of James Madison, 1790–1802, 336 (Hunt ed. 1906) (quoting a memorial to a French minister) (emphasis in original).

This Court has recognized this imperative: "[T]o insure the ascertainment and publication of the truth about public affairs, it is essential that the First Amendment protect some erroneous publications as well as true ones." St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U. S. 727, 732 (1968). We thus hold that a libel action, as here, by a private individual against a licensed radio station for a defamatory falsehood in a newscast relating to his involvement in an event of public or general concern may be sustained only upon clear and convincing proof that the defamatory falsehood was published with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not.[18] Calculated falsehood, of course, falls outside "the fruitful exercise of the right of free speech." Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 75 (1964).

Our Brothers Harlan and Marshall reject the knowing or reckless falsehood standard in favor of a test which would require, at least, that the person defamed establish that the publisher negligently failed to ascertain the truth of his story; they would also limit any recovery to "actual" damages. For the reasons we have stated, the negligence standard gives insufficient breathing space to First Amendment values. Limiting recovery to actual damages has the same defects. In the first instance, that standard, too, leaves the First Amendment insufficient elbow room within which to function. It is not simply the possibility of a judgment for damages which results in self-censorship. The very possibility of having to engage in litigation, an expensive and protracted process, is threat enough to cause discussion and debate to "steer far wider of the unlawful zone" thereby keeping protected discussion from public cognizance. Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 526 (1958). Cf. Blonder-Tongue Laboratories, Inc. v. University of Illinois Found., — U.S. —, [21]–[29] (1971. Too, a small newspaper suffers equally from a substantial damage award, whether the label of the award be "actual" or "punitive."

The real thrust of Brothers Harlan and Marshall's position, however, is their assertion that their proposal will not "constitutionalize" the factfinding process. But this clearly is not the way their test would work in practice. Their approach means only that factfinding will shift from an inquiry into whether the defamatory statements were knowingly or recklessly uttered to the inquiry whether they were negligently uttered, and if so, to an inquiry whether plaintiff suffered "actual" damages. This latter inquiry will involve judges even more deeply in factfinding. Would the mere announcement by a state legislature that embarrassment and pain and suffering are measurable actual losses mean that such damages may be awarded in libel actions? No matter how the problem is approached, this Court would ultimately have to fashion constitutional definitions of "negligence" and of "actual damages."

[18] At oral argument petitioner argued that "the little man can't show actual malice. How can George Rosenbloom show that there was actual malice in Metromedia? They never heard of him before." Transcript of oral argument 39. But ill will toward the plaintiff, or bad motive, are not elements of the New York Times standard. That standard requires only that the plaintiff prove knowing or reckless falsity. That burden, and no more, is the plaintiff's whether "public official," "public figure," or "little man." It may be that jury instructions that are couched only in terms of knowing or reckless falsity, and omit reference to "actual malice," would further a proper application of the Times standard to the evidence.

Aside from these particularized considerations, we have repeatedly recognized that courts may not avoid an excursion into factfinding in this area simply because it is time consuming or difficult. We stated in Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 335 (1946), that:

> "The Constitution has imposed upon this Court final authority to determine the meaning and application of those words of that instrument which require interpretation to resolve judicial issues. With that responsibility, we are compelled to examine for ourselves the statements in issue and the circumstances under which they were made to see whether or not they . . . are of a character which the principles of the First Amendment, as adopted by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, protect." (Footnote omitted).

Clearly, then, this Court has an "obligation to test challenged judgments against the guarantees of the First and Fourteenth Amendments," and in doing so "this Court cannot avoid making an independent constitutitonal judgment on the facts of the case." Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184, 190 (1964). The simple fact is that First Amendment questions of "constitutional fact" compel this Court's de novo review. See Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229, 235 (1963); Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U.S. 199, 205 n. 5 (1960).

VI

Petitioner argues that the instructions or punitive damages either cured or rendered harmless the instructions permitting an award of general damages based on a finding of failure of WIP to exercise reasonable care. We have doubts of the merits of the premise,[19] but even assuming that instructions were given satisfying the standard of knowing or reckless falsity, the evidence was insufficient to sustain an award for the petitioner under that standard. In these cases a court's "duty is not limited to the elaboration of constitutional principles; we must also in proper cases review the evidence to make certain that those principles have been constitutionally applied." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S., at 285. Our independent analysis of the record leads us to agree with the Court of Appeals that none of the proofs, considered either singly or cumulatively, satisfies the constitutional standard with the convincing clarity necessary to raise a jury question whether the defamatory falsehoods were broadcast with knowledge that they were false or with reckless disregard of whether they were false or not.

The evidence most strongly supporting petitioner is that concerning his visit to WIP's studio where a parttime newscaster hung up the telephone when petitioner disputed the newscaster's statement that the District Attorney had characterized petitioner's magazines as obscene. This contact occurred, however, after all but one of the second series of broadcasts had been aired. The incident has no probative value insofar as it bears on petitioner's case as to the first series of broadcasts. That portion of petitioner's case was based on the omission from the first two broadcasts at 6 and 6:30 p.m. on October 4 of the word "alleged" preceding a characterization of the magazines distributed by petiioner. But that omission was corrected with the 8 p.m. broadcast and was not repeated in the five broadcasts which followed. And we agree with the analysis of the Court of Appeals which led that court, and leads us, to conclude that the episode failed to provide evidence satisfying the Times standard insofar as it bore on petitioner's case based upon the broadcasts on and after October 21 concerning petitioner's law suit:

> "Only one broadcast took place after this conversation. It is attacked on the ground that it contains an inaccurate statement concerning plaintiff's injunction action in that it stated that the district attorney considered plaintiff's publications to be smut and immoral literature. The transcript of the testimony shows that Plaintiff's own attorney, when questioning defendant's representative concerning the allegedly defamatory portion of the last broad> cast, said that he was not questioning its 'accuracy'. Furthermore, his examination of the same witness brought out that defendant's representative confirmed the story with the judge involved before the broadcast was made. We think the episode failed to provide evidence of actual malice with the requisite convincing clarity to create a jury issue under federal standards." 415 F. 2d, at 897.

[19] The instructions authorized an award of punitive damages upon a finding that a falsehood "arose from a bad motive, or . . . that it was published with reckless indifference to the truth . . . punitive damages are awarded as a deterrent from future conduct of the same sort." App., at 333a. The summation of petitioner's counsel conceded that respondent harbored no ill-will toward petitioner, but, following the suggestion of the instructions that punitive damages are "'smart' money," App., at 313a, argued that they should be assessed because "[respondent] must be careful the way they impart news information, and you can punish them if they weren't because you could say that was malicious." Ibid. This was an obvious invitation based on the instructions to award punitive damages for carelessness. Thus the jury was allowed, and even encouraged, to find malice and award punitive damages merely on the basis of negligence and bad motive.

Petitioner argues finally that WIP's failure to communicate with him to learn his side of the case and to obtain a copy of the magazine for examination, sufficed to support a verdict under the Times standard. But our "cases are clear that reckless conduct is not measured by whether a reasonably prudent man would have published, or would have investigated before publishing. There must be sufficient evidence to permit the conclusion that the defendant in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his publication." St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S., at 731. Respondent here relied on information supplied by police officials. Following petitioner's complaint about the accuracy of the broadcasts, WIP checked its last report with the judge who presided in the case. While we may assume that the District Court correctly held to be defamatory respondent's characterizations of petitioner's business as "the smut literature racket," and of those engaged in it as "girlie-book peddlers," there is no evidence in the record to support a conclusion that respondent "in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth" of its reports.

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, concurring in the judgment.

I concur in the judgment of the Court for the reasons stated in my concurring opinion in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 293 (1964), in my concurring and dissenting opinion in Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 170 (1967), and in MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS' concurring opinion in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 80 (1964). I agree of course that First Amendment protection extends to "all discussion and communication involving matters of legitimate public concern, without regard to whether the persons involved are famous or anonymous." Ante, at ——. However, in my view, the First Amendment does not permit the recovery of libel judgments against the news media even when statements are broadcast with knowledge they are false. As I stated in Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, supra, "[I]t is time for this Court to abandon New York Times Co. v. Sullivan and adopt the rule to the effect that the First Amendment was intended to leave the press free from the harassment of libel judgments." Id., at 172.

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, concurring in the judgment.

I

Under existing law the First Amendment is deemed to permit recoveries for damaging falsehoods published about public officials or public figures only if the defamation is knowingly or recklessly false. But until today the First Amendment has not been thought to prevent citizens who are neither public officials nor public figures from recovering damages for defamation upon proving publication of a false statement injurious to their reputation. There has been no necessity to show deliberate falsehood, reklessness, or even negligence.

The Court has now decided that the First Amendment requires further restrictions on state defamation laws. MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN and two other members of the Court would require proof of knowing or reckless misrepresentation of the facts whenever the publication concerns a subject of legitimate public interest, even though the target is a "private" citizen. Only residual areas would remain in which a lower degree of proof would obtain.

Three other members of the Court also agree that private reputation has enjoyed too much protection and the media too little. But in the interest of protecting reputation, they would not roll back state laws so far. They would interpret the First Amendment as proscribing liability without fault and would equate non-negligent falsehood with faultless conduct. The burden of the damaging lie would be shifted from the media to the private citizen unless the latter could prove negligence or some higher degree of fault. They would also drastically limit the authority of the States to award compensatory and punitive damages for injury to reputation.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, consistently with the views that he and MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS have long held, finds no room in the First Amendment for any defamation recovery whatsoever.

Given this spectrum of proposed restrictions on state defamation laws and assuming that MR. JUSTICE BLACK and MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS will continue in future cases to support the severest of the restrictions, it would seem that at least five members of the Court would support each of the following rules:

For public officers and public figures to recover for damage to their reputations for libelous falsehoods, they must prove either knowing or reckless disregard of the truth. All other plaintiffs must prove at least negligent falsehood, but if the publication about them was in an area of legitimate public interest, then they too must prove deliberate or reckless error. In all actions for libel or slander, actual damages must be proved, and awards of punitive damages will be strictly limited.

II

For myself, I cannot join any of the opinions filed in this case. Each of them decides broader constitutional issues and displaces more state libel law than is necessary for the decision in this case. As I have said, MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN would extend the privilege enunciated in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), to publications upon any "subject of legitimate public interest." See ante, at —. He would thereby extend the constitutional protection to false and damaging, but nonmalicious publications about such matters as the health and environmental hazards of widely used manufactured products, the mental and emotional stability of executives of business establishments, and the racial and religious prejudices of many groups and individuals. All of these are, of course, subjects of real concern and arguments for placing them within the scope of New York Times are by no means frivolous.

For MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL and MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN'S opinion is both too severe and too limited. They would make more sweeping incursions into state tort law but purportedly with less destructive weapons. They would permit suit by some plaintiffs barred under MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN'S opinion, but would require all plaintiffs to prove at least negligence before any recovery would be allowed.

I prefer at this juncture not to proceed on such a broad front. I am quite sure that New York Times Co. v. Sullivan was the wiser course, but I am unaware that state libel laws with respect to private citizens have proved a hazard to the existence or operations of the communications industry in this country. The Court seems haunted by fears of self-censorship by the press and of damage judgments that will threaten its financial health. But technology has immeasurably increased the power of the press to do both good and evil. Vast communication combines have been built into profitable ventures. My interest is not in protecting the treasuries of communicators but in implementing the First Amendment by insuring that effective communication which is essential to the continued functioning of our free society. I am not aware that self-censorship has caused the press to tread too gingerly in reporting "news" concerning private citizens and private affairs or that the reputation of private citizens has received inordinate protection from falsehood. I am not convinced that we must fashion a constitutional rule protecting a whole range of damaging falsehoods and so shift the burden from those who publish to those who are injured.

I say this with considerable deference since all my Brethren have contrary views. But I would not nullify a major part of state libel law until we have given the matter the most thorough consideration and can articulate some solid First Amendment grounds based on experience and our present condition. As it is, today's experiment rests almost entirely on theoretical grounds and represents a purely intellectual derivation from what are thought to be important principles of tort law as viewed in the light of the primacy of the written and spoken word.

This case lends itself to more limited adjudication. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan itself made clear that discussion of the official actions of public servants such as the police is constitutionally privileged. "The right of free public discussion of the stewardship of public officials" is, in the language of that case, "a fundamental principle of the American form of government." 376 U.S., at 275. Discussion of the conduct of public officials cannot, however, be subjected to artificial limitations designed to protect others involved in an episode with officials from unfavorable publicity. Such limitations would deprive the public of full information about the official action which took place. In the present case, for example, the public would learn nothing if publication only of the fact that the police made an arrest were permitted; it is also necessary that the grounds for the arrest and, in many circumstances, the identity of the person arrested be stated. In short, it is rarely informative for a newspaper or broadcaster to state merely that officials acted unless he also states the reasons for their action and the persons whom their action affected.

Nor can New York Times be read as permitting publications that invade the privacy or injure the reputations of officials, but forbidding those that invade the privacy or injure the reputations of private citizens against whom official action is directed. New York Times gives the broadcasting media and the press the right not only to censure and criticize officials but also to praise them and the concomitant right to censure and criticize their adversaries. To extend constitutional protection to criticism only of officials would be to authorize precisely that sort of thought control which the First Amendment forbids government to exercise.

I would accordingly hold that in defamation actions, absent actual malice as defined in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, the First Amendment gives the press and the broadcast media a privilege to report and comment upon the official actions of public servants in full detail, with no requirement that the reputation or the privacy of an individual involved in or affected by the official action be spared from public view. Since respondent Metromedia did nothing more in the instant case, I join with the Court in holding its broadcasts privileged. I would not, however, adjudicate cases not now before the Court.

Mr. Justice Harlan, dissenting.

The very facts of this case demonstrate that uncritical acceptance of the Pennsylvania libel law here involved would be inconsistent with those important First and Fourteenth Amendment values we first treated with in an analogous context in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964). However, as the plurality opinion implicitly recognizes, only an undiscriminating assessment of those values would lead us to extend the New York Times rule in full force to all purely private libels. My Brother Brennan's opinion would resolve the dilemma by distinguishing those private libels that arise out of events found to be of "public or general concern" from those that do not, and subjecting the former to full-scale application of the New York Times rule.

For the reasons set forth in Part I of my Brother Marshall's dissent, I cannot agree to such a solution. As he so well demonstrates, the principal failing of the plurality opinion is its inadequate appreciation of the limitations imposed by the legal process in accommodating the tension between state libel laws and the federal constitutional protection given to freedom of speech and press.

Once the evident need to balance the values underlying each is perceived, it might seem, purely as an abstract matter, that the most utilitarian approach would be to scrutinize carefully every jury verdict in every libel case, in order to ascertain whether the final judgment leaves fully protected whatever First Amendment values[20] transcend the legitimate state interest in protecting the particular plaintiff who prevailed. This seems to be what is done in the plurality opinion. But we did not embrace this technique in New York Times, supra. Instead, as my Brother Marshall observes, we there announced a rule of general application, not ordinarily dependent for its implementation upon a case-by-case examination of trial court verdicts. See also my dissent in Time, Inc. v. Pape, —— U.S. ——, —— (1971). Nor do I perceive any developments in the seven years since we decided New York Times, supra, that suggest our original method should now be abandoned. At least where we can discern generally applicable rules that should balance with fair precision the competing interests at stake, such rules should be preferred to the plurality's approach both in order to preserve a measure of order and predictability in the law that must govern the daily conduct of affairs and to avoid subjecting the press to judicial second-guessing of the newsworthiness of each item they print. Consequently, I fully concur in Part I of Mr. Justice Marshall's dissent.

[20] Of course, for me, this case presents a Fourteenth, not a purely First, Amendment issue, for the question is one of the constitutionality of the applicable Pennsylvania libel laws. However, I have found it convenient, in the course of this opinion, occasionally to speak directly of the First Amendment as a short-hand phrase for identifying those constitutional values of freedom of expression guaranteed to individuals by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Further, I largely agree with the alternative proposals of that dissent. I, too, think that, when dealing with private libel, the States should be free to define for themselves the applicable standard of care so long as they do not impose liability without fault; that a showing of actual damage should be a requisite to recovery for libel; and that it is impermissible, given the substantial constitutional values involved, to fail to confine the amount of jury verdicts in such cases within any ascertainable limits. However, my reasons for so concluding are somewhat different than his, and I therefore reach a different result than he does with respect to the tolerable limits of punitive damages.

I

I think we will agree on certain core propositions. First, as a general matter, the States have a perfectly legitimate interest, exercised in a variety of ways, in redressing and preventing careless conduct, no matter who is responsible for it, that inflicts actual, measurable injury upon individual citizens. Secondly, there is no identifiable value worthy of constitutional protection in the publication of falsehoods. Third, although libel law provides that truth is a complete defense, that principle, standing alone, is insufficient to satisfy the constitutional interest in freedom of speech and press. For we have recognized that it is inevitable that there will be "some error in situation presented in free debate," Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 406 (1967) (opinion of this writer), a process that needs "breathing space," NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 433 (1963), to flourish, and that "putting to the pre-existing prejudices of a jury the determination of what is 'true' may effectively institute a system of censorship," Time, Inc. v. Hill, supra, at 406.

Moreover, any system that punishes certain speech is likely to induce self-censorship by those who would otherwise exercise their constitutional freedom. Given the constitutionally protected interest in unfettered speech, it requires an identifiable, countervailing state interest, consistent with First Amendment values, to justify a regulatory scheme that produces such results. And, because the presence of such values dictates closer scrutiny of this aspect of state tort law than the Fourteenth Amendment would otherwise command, it may well be that certain rules, impervious to constitutional attack when applied to ordinary human conduct, may have to be altered or abandoned where used to regulate speech. Finally, as determined in New York Times, the constitutional interest in tolerance of falsehood as well as the need to adjust competing societal interests, prohibits, at a minimum, the imposition of liability without fault.

The precise standard of care necessary to achieve these goals is, however, a matter of dispute as is the range of penalties a State may prescribe for a breach of that standard. In analyzing these problems it is necessary to begin with a general analytical framework that defines those competing interests that must be reconciled. My Brother MARSHALL's opinion, I think, dwells too lightly upon the nature of the legitimate countervailing interests promoted by the State's libel law and, as a result, overstates the case agains punitive damages. Because we deal with a set of legal rules that treat truth as a complete defense it strikes, I think, somewhat wide of the mark to treat the State's interest as one of protecting reputations from "unjustified invasion." Opinion, at 1. By hypothesis, the respondent here was free to reveal any true facts about petitioner's "obscure private life." [21]

Given the defense of truth, it is my judgment that, in order to assure that it promotes purposes consistent with First Amendment values, the legitimate function of libel law must be understood as that of compensating individuals for actual, measurable harm caused by the conduct of others. This can best be demonstrated by postulating a law that subjects publishers to jury verdicts for falsehoods that have done the plaintiff no harm. In my view, such a rule can only serve a purpose antithetical to those of the First Amendment. It penalizes speech, not to redress or avoid the infliction of harm, but only to deter the press from publishing material regarding private behavior that turns out to be false simply because of its falsity. This the First Amendment will not tolerate. Where the State cannot point to any tangible danger, even knowingly erroneous publication is entitled to constitutional protection because of the interest in avoiding an inquiry into the mere truth or falsity of speech. Moreover, such a scheme would impose a burden on speaking not generally placed upon constitutionally unprotected conduct—the payment of private fines for conduct which, although not conformed to establish limits of care, causes no harm in fact.

[21] I would expressly reserve, for a case properly presenting it, the issue whether the New York Times rule should have any effect on "privacy" litigation. The problem is briefly touched upon in Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 404–405 (1967) (HARLAN, J., concurring and dissenting).

Conversely, I think that where the purpose and effect of the law is to redress actual and measurable injury to private individuals that was reasonably foreseeable as a result of the publication, there is no necessary conflict with the values of freedom of speech. Just as an automobile negligently driven can cost a person his physical and mental well-being and the fruits of his labor, so can a printing press negligently set. While the First Amendment protects the press from the imposition of special liabilities upon it, "[t]o exempt a publisher, because of the nature of his calling, from an imposition generally exacted from other members of the community, would be to extend a protection not required by the constitutional guarantee." Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 160 (1967) (opinion of this writer). A business "is not immune from regulation because it is an agency of the press. The publisher of a newspaper has no special immunity from the application of general laws. He has no special privilege to involve the rights and liberties of others." Associated Press v. NLRB, 301 U.S. 103, 132–133 (1937). That the damage has been inflicted by words rather than other instrumentalities cannot insulate it from liability. States may legitimately be required to use finer regulatory tools where dealing with "speech," but they are not wholly disabled from exacting compensation for its measurable adverse consequences. If this is not so, it is difficult to understand why governments may, for example, proscribe "misleading" advertising practices or specify what is "true" in the dissemination of consumer credit advertisements.

Nor does this interest in compensating victims of harmful conduct somehow disappear when the damages inflicted are great. So long as the effect of the law of libel is simply to make publishers pay for the harm they cause, and the standard of care required is appropriately adjusted to take account of the special countervailing interests in an open exchange of ideas, the fact that this may involve the payment of substantial sums cannot plausibly be said to raise serious First Amendment problems. If a newspaper refused to pay its bills because to do so would put it out of business, would the First Amendment dictate that this be treated as a partial or complete defense? If an automobile carrying a newsman to the scene of a history-making event ran over a pedestrian, would the size of the verdict, if based upon generally applicable tort law principles, have to be assessed against the probability that it would deter broadcasters from news gathering before it could pass muster under the First Amendment?

However, without foreclosing the possibility that other limiting principles may be surfaced by subsequent experience, I do think that since we are dealing, by hypothesis, with infliction of harm through the exercise of freedom of speech and the press to which the Constitution gives explicit protection, recoverable damages must be limited to those consequences of the publication which are reasonably foreseeable. The usual tort rule seems to be that once some foreseeable injury has been inflicted, the negligent defendant must compensate for all damages he proximately caused in fact, no matter how peculiar were the circumstances of the particular plaintiff involved. Prosser, The Law of Torts § 50 (1964). However, our cases establish, I think, that, unless he has knowledge to the contrary, a speaker is entitled to presume that he is addressing an audience that is not especially susceptible to distress at the spector of open, uninhibited, robust speech. Cohen v. California, —— U.S. —— (1971). See also Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969); Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380 (1957). Thus, I think the speaker should be free from a duty to compensate for actual harm inflicted by his falsehoods where the defamation would not have caused such harm to a person of average sensibilities unless, of course, the speaker knew that his statements were made concerning an unusually sensitive person. In short, I think the First Amendment does protect generally against the possibility of self-censorship in order to avoid unwitting affronts to the frail and the queasy.

II

Of course, it does not follow that so long as libel law performs the same compensatory function as civil law generally it is necessarily legitimate in all its various applications. The presence of First Amendment values means that the State can be compelled to utilize finer, more discriminating instruments of regulation where necessary to give more careful protection to these countervailing interests. New York Times, supra, and Curtis Publishing, supra, established that where the injured party is a "public figure" or a "public official," the interest in freedom of speech dictates that the States forgo their interest in compensating for actual harm, even upon a basis generally applicable to all members of society, unless the plaintiff can show that the injurious publication was false and was made "with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." New York Times, supra, at 280. Tacitly recognizing that it would unduly sacrifice the operative legitimate state interests to extend this rule to all cases where the injured party is simply a private individual, the plurality opinion would nevertheless apply it where the publication concerned such a person's "involvement in an event of public or general concern." Ante, at 22. I would not overrule New York Times or Curtis Publishing and I do agree, as indicated above, that making liability turn on simple falsity in the purely private libel area is not constitutionally permissible. But I would not construe the Federal Constitution to require that the States adhere to a standard other than that of reasonable care when the plaintiff is an ordinary citizen.

My principal concern with the plurality's view, of course, is that voiced by my Brother MARSHALL. However, even if this objection were not tenable, unlike the plurality, I do think there is a difference, relevant to the interests here involved, between the public and the private plaintiff, as our cases have defined these categories, and that maintaining a constitutional distinction between them is at least as likely to protect true First Amendment concerns as one that eradicates such a line and substitutes for it a distinction between matters we think are of true social significance and those we think are not.

To begin, it does no violence, in my judgment, to the value of freedom of speech and press to impose a duty of reasonable care upon those who would exercise these freedoms. I do not think it can be gainsaid that the States have a substantial interest in encouraging speakers to carefuly seek the truth before they communicate, as well as in compensating persons actually harmed by false descriptions of their personal behavior. Additionally, the burden of acting reasonably in taking action that may produce adverse consequences for others is one generally placed upon all in our society. Thus, history itself belies the argument that a speaker must somehow be freed of the ordinary constraints of acting with reasonable care in order to contribute to the public good while, for example, doctors, accountants, and architects have constantly performed within such bounds.

This does not mean that I do not agree with the rule of New York Times, supra, but only that I deem it inapplicable here. That rule was not, I think, born solely of a desire to free speech that would otherwise have been stifled by overly restrictive rules, but also rested upon a determination that the countervailing state interests, described above, were not fully applicable where the subject of the falsehood was a public official or a public figure. For me, it does seem quite clear that the public person has a greater likelihood of securing access to channels of communication sufficient to rebutt falsehoods concerning him than do private individuals in this country who do not toil in the public spotlight. Similiarly, our willingness to assume that public personalities are more impervious to criticism, and may be held to have run the risk of publicly circulated falsehoods concerning them, does not rest solely upon an empirical assertion of fact, but also upon a belief that, in our political system, the individual speaker is entitled to act upon such an assumption if our institutions are to be held up, as they should be, to constant scrutiny. And, at least as to the "public official," it seems to be universally the case that he is entitled to an absolute immunity for what he may utter in response to the charges of others. Where such factors are present the need to provide monetary compensation for defamation appears a good deal more attenuated. Finally, in light of the plurality opinion's somewhat extravagant delineation of the public interest involved in the dissemination of information about nonpublic persons, it bears emphasizing that a primary rationale for extending the New York Times rule to public figures was the desire to reflect, in the constitutional balance, the fact that "in this country, the distinctions between governmental and private sectors are blurred." Curtis Publishing, supra, at 163 (opinion of Warren, C. J.), and to treat constitutional values as specially implicated where important, albeit nonofficial, policy and behavior was the subject of discussion. At the very least, this tends to diminish the force of any contention that libelous depictions of nonpublic persons are often likely to involve matters of abiding public significance.

I cannot agree that the First Amendment gives special protection to the press from "[t]he very possibility of having to engage in litigation," ante, at 23 (opinion of Brennan, J.). Were this assertion tenable, I do not see why the States could ever enforce their libel laws. Cf. my Brother Black's opinion, ante, at———. Further, it would certainly cast very grave doubts upon the constitutionality of so-called "right of reply statutes" advocated by the plurality, ante, at 17, n. 15, and ultimately treat the application of any general law to a publisher or broadcaster as an important First Amendment issue. The notion that such an interest, in the context of a purely private libel, is a significant independent constitutional value is an unfortunate consequence of the plurality's single-minded devotion to the task of preventing self-censorship, regardless of the purposes for which such restraint is induced or the evils its exercise tends to avoid.

It is, then, my judgment that the reasonable care standard adequately serves those First Amendment values that must inform the definition of actionable libel and that those special considerations that made even this standard an insufficiently precise technique when applied to plaintiffs who are "public officials" or "public figures" do not obtain where the litigant is a purely private individual.

III

There remains the problem of punitive damages.[22] No doubt my Brother Marshall is correct in asserting that the specter of being forced to pay out substantial punitive damage awards is likely to induce self-censorship. This would probably also be the case where the harm actually caused is likely to be great. But, as I indicated above, this fact in itself would not justify construing the First Amendment to impose an arbitrary limitation on the amount of actual damages recoverable. Thus, as my Brother Marshall would apparently agree—since, he, too, proposes no limitation on actual damages—one cannot jump from the proposition that fear of substantial punitive damage awards may be an important factor in inducing self-censorship directly to the result that punitive damages cannot be assessed in all private libel cases. A more particularized inquiry into the nature of the competing interests involved is necessary in order to ascertain whether awarding punitive damages must inevitably, in private libel cases, serve only interests that are incompatible with the First Amendment.

At a minimum, even in the purely private libel area, I think the First Amendment should be construed to limit the imposition of punitive damages to those situations where actual malice is proved. This is the typical standard employed in assessing anyone's liability for punitive damages where the underlying aim of the law is to compensate for harm actually caused, see, e.g., 3 L. Frumer, et al., Personal Injury § 2.02 (1965); H. Oleck, Damages to Persons and Property § 30 (1955), and no conceivable state interest could justify imposing a harsher standard on the exercise of those freedoms that are given explicit protection by the First Amendment.

The question then arises whether further limitations on this general state power must be imposed in order to serve the particularized goals of the First Amendment. The most compelling rationale for providing punitive damages where actual malice is shown is that such damages assure that deterrent force is added to the jury's verdict. If the speaker's conduct was quite likely to produce substantial harm, but fortuitously did not, simple assessment of actual damages will not fully reflect the social interest in deterring that conduct generally. Further, even if the harm done was great the defendant may have unusually substantial resources that make the award of actual damages a trivial inconvenience of no actual deterrent value. And even where neither of these factors obtains, the State always retains an interest in punishing more severely conduct that, although it causes the same effect, is more morally blameworthy. For example, consider the distinction between manslaughter and first-degree murder.

I find it impossible to say, at least without further judicial experience in this area, that the First Amendment interest in avoiding self-censorship will always outweigh the state interest in vindicating these policies. It seems that a legislative choice is permissible which, for example, seeks to induce, through a reasonable monetary assessment, repression of false materials, published with actual malice, that is demonstrably harmful and reasonably thought capable of causing substantial harm, but, in fact, was not so fully injurious to the individual attacked. Similarly, the State surely has a legitimate interest in seeking to assure that its system of compensating victims of negligent behavior also operates upon all as an inducement to avoidance of such conduct. And, these are burdens that are placed on all members of society, thus permitting the press to escape them only if its interest is somehow different in this regard.

[22] The conclusions I reach in Part III of this opinion are somewhat different than those I embraced four Terms ago in Curtis Publishing Co., supra, at 159–161. Where matters are in flux, however, it is more important to re-think past conclusions than to adhere to them without question and the problem under consideration remains in a state of evolution, as is attested to by all the opinions filed today. Reflection has convinced me that my earlier opinion painted with somewhat too broad a brush and that a more precise balancing of the conflicting interests involved is called for in this delicate area.

However, from the standpoint of the individual plaintiff such damage awards are windfalls. They are, in essence, private fines levied for purposes that may be wholly unrelated to the circumstances of the actual litigant. That fact alone is not, I think, enough to condemn them. The State may, as it often does, use the vehicle of a private lawsuit to serve broader public purposes. It is noteworthy that my Brother MARSHALL does not rest his objection to punitive damages upon these grounds. He fears, instead, the self-censorship that may flow from the unbridled discretion of juries to set the amount of such damages. I agree that where these amounts bear no relationship to the actual harm caused, they then serve essentially as springboards to jury assessment, without reference to the primary legitimating compensatory function of the system, of an infinitely wide range of penalties wholly unpredictable in amount at the time of the publication and that this must be a substantial factor in inducing self-censorship. Further, I find it difficult to fathom why it may be necessary, in order to achieve its justifiable deterrence goals, for the States to permit punitive damages that bear no discernible relationship to the actual harm caused by the publication at issue. A rational determination of the injury a publication might potentially have inflicted should typically proceed from the harm done in fact. And where the compensatory scheme seeks to achieve deterrence as a subsidiary by-product, the desired deterrence, if not precisely measured by actual damages, should be informed by that touchstone if deterrence of falsehood is not to replace compensation for harm as the paramount goal. Finally, while our legal system does often mete out harsher punishment for more culpable acts, it typically begins with a gradation of offenses defined in terms of effects. Compare, for example, larceny with murder. It is not surprising then, that most States apparently require that punitive damages in most private civil actions bear some reasonable relation to the actual damage awarded. H. Oleck, supra § 275. Pennsylvania included. Weider v. Hoffman, 238 F. Supp. 437, 444–447 (MD Pa. 1965).

However, where the amount of punitive damages awarded bears a reasonable and purposeful relationship to the actual harm done, I cannot agree that the Constitution must be read to prohibit such an award. Indeed, as I understand it, my Brother MARSHALL's objection to my position[23] is not that the interest in freedom of speech dictates eliminating such judgments, but that this result is compelled by the need to avoid involving courts in an "ad hoc balancing" of "the content of the speech and the surrounding circumstances." Opinion, at 8, much like that undertaken today in Part VI of the plurality opinion, the same technique criticized in my dissent in Time, Inc. v. Pape, supra. I find this argument unpersuasive. First, I do not see why my proposed rule would necessarily require frequent judicial reweighing of the facts underlying each jury verdict. A carefully and properly instructed jury should ordinarily be able to arrive at damage awards that are self-validating. It is others, not I, who have placed upon the federal courts the general duty of reweighing jury verdicts regarding the degree of fault demonstrated in libel actions. Further, to the extent that supervision of jury verdicts would be required it would entail a different process than that undertaken where judges redetermine the degree of fault. The defendant's resources, the actual harm suffered by the plaintiff, and the publication's potential for actual harm are all susceptible of more or less objective measurement. And the overriding principle that deterrence is not to be made a substitute for compensation should serve as a useful mechanism for adjusting the equation. Finally, even if some marginal "ad hoc balancing" becomes necessary, I should [23] Of course, I do not envision that, consistently with my views, the States could only exact some predetermined multiple of the actual damages found. I should think a jury could simply be instructed, along the lines set out in my opinion, on the legitimate use of the punitive damage award and the necessity for relating any such judgment to the harm actually done.

think it the duty of this Court at least to attempt to implement such a process before preempting, for itself, all state power in this regard.[24]

In sum, given the fact that it seems to reflect the majority rule, that most of our jurisprudence proceeds upon the premise that legislative purposes can be achieved by fitting the punishment to the crime, and since we deal here with a precise constitutional interest that may legitimately require the States to resort to more discriminating regulation within a more circumscribed area of permissible concern, I would hold unconstitutional, in a private libel case, jury authority to award punitive damages which is unconfined by the requirement that these awards bear a reasonable and purposeful relationship to the actual harm done. Conversely, where the jury authority has been exercised within such constraints, and the plaintiff has proved that the speaker acted out of express malice, given the present state of judicial experience, I think it would be an unwarranted intrusion into the legitimate legislative processes of the States and an impermissibly broad construction of the First Amendment to nullify that state action.

Because the Court of Appeals adjudicated this case upon principles wholly unlike those suggested here, I would vacate the judgment below and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with the views expressed herein.

MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL, with whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART joins, dissenting.

Here, unlike the other cases involving the New York Times[25] doctrine, we are dealing with an individual who held no public office, who had not taken part in any public controversy, and who lived an obscure private life.[26] George Rosenbloom, before the events and reports of the events involved here, was just one of the millions of Americans who live their lives in obscurity.

The protection of the reputation of such anonymous persons "from unjustified invasion and wrongful hurt reflects no more than our basic concept of the essential dignity and worth of every human being—a concept at the root of any decent system of ordered liberty." Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 92 (1966) (STEWART, J., concurring). But the concept of a citizenry informed by a free and unfettered press is also basic to our system of ordered liberty. Here these two essential and fundamental values conflict.

The plurality has attempted to resolve the conflict by creating a conditional constitutional privilege for defamation published in connection with an event that is found to be of "public or general concern." The condition for the privilege is that the defamation must not be "published with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." I believe that this approach offers inadequate protection for both of the basic values that are at stake.

In order for particular defamation to come within the privilege there must be a determination that the event was of legitimate public interest. That determination will have to be made by courts generally, and in the last analysis, by this Court in particular. Courts, including this one, are not anointed with any extraordinary prescience. But, assuming that under the rule announced by MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN for the plurality, courts are not simply to take a poll to determine whether a substantial portion of the population is interested or concerned in a subject, courts will be required to somehow pass on the legitimacy of interest in a particular event or subject: what information is relevant to self-government. See Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357, 375 (1926) (Brandeis J., concurring). The danger such a doctrine portends for freedom of the press seems apparent.

[24] The plurality opinion states that the "real thrust" of my position is that it "will not 'constitutionalize' the factfinding process." Ante, at 23. In fact, I have attempted to demonstrate throughout this opinion that I believe the position of my Brothers BRENNAN, BLACK, and MARSHALL all, in varying degrees, overstate the extent to which libel law is incompatible with the constitutional guarantee of freedom of expression, and have pointed out that I think my views have merit "even if [the objection noted by the plurality] were not tenable." Supra, at 8. Moreover, the assertion that an inquiry into whether actual damages were suffered "will involve judges even more deeply in factfinding," ante, at 24, than ascertaining whether "the defendant in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his publication," ante, at 27, or whether the publication involved "an event of public or general concern," ante, at 22, seems to me to carry its own refutation. The former focuses on measurable, objective fact; the latter upon subjective, personal belief. Finally, I cannot see why juries may not typically be entrusted responsibly to determine whether a publisher was negligent, a function they perform in judging the harmful conduct of most other members of society; or why it should be materially more difficult for judges to oversee such decisions where a speaker, rather than any other actor, is a defendant.

[26] See, e.g., Associated Press v. Walker, 388 U.S. 130 (1967); Curtis Pub. Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967); Beckley Newspaper Corp. v. Hanks, 389 U.S. 81 (1967); Greenbelt Publ. Assn. v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970); Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (1966).

The plurality's doctrine also threatens society's interest in protecting private individuals from being thrust into the public eye by the distorting light of defamation. This danger exists since all human events are arguably within the area of "public or general concern." My Brother Brennan does not try to provide guidelines or standards by which courts are to decide the scope of public concern. He does, however, indicate that areas exist that are not the proper focus of public concern, and cites Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965). But it is apparent that in an era of a dramatic threat of overpopulation and one in which previously accepted standards of conduct are widely heralded as outdated, even the intimate and personal concerns with which the Court dealt in that case cannot be said to be outside the area of "legitimate public concern."

The threats and inadequacies of using the plurality's conditional privilege to resolve the conflict between the two basic values involved here have been illustrated by the experience courts have had in trying to deal with the right of privacy. See Cohen, A New Niche For the Fault Principle: A Forthcoming Newsworthiness Privilege in Libel Cases?, 18 U.S.L.A. L. Rev. 371, 379–381 (1970); Kalven, Privacy in Tort Law—Were Warren and Brandeis Wrong?, 31 Law and Contemp. Problems 326, 336 (1966). The authors of the most famous of all law review articles recommended that no protection be given to privacy interests when the publication dealt with a "matter which is of public or general interest." Warren and Brandeis, The Right to Privacy, 4 Harv. L. Rev. 193, 214 (1890). Yet cases dealing with this caveat raise serious questions whether it has substantially destroyed the right of privacy as Warren and Bandeis envisioned it.[27] For example, the publictaion of a picture of the body of plaintiff's daughter immediately after her death in an automobile accident was held to be protected. Kelley v. Post Publishing Co., 237 Mass. 275, 98 N.E. 2d 286 (1951). And the publication of the details of the somewhat peculiar behavior of a former child prodigy, who had a passion for obscurity, was found to involve a matter of public concern. Sidis v. F-R Pub. Corp., 113 F. 2d 806 (CA2 1940).

In New York Times the Court chose to balance the competing interest by seeming to announce a generally applicable rule. Here it is apparent that the general rule announced cannot have general applicability. The plurality's conditional privilege approach, when coupled with constitutionalizing of the factfinding process,[28] see Part VI of Mr. Justice Brennan's opinion, results in the adoption of an ad hoc balancing of the two interests involved. The Court is required to weigh the nuances of each particular circumstance on its scale of values regarding the relative importance of society's interest in protecting individuals from defamation against the importance of a free press. This scale may arguably be a more finely tuned instrument in a particular case. But whatever precision the ad hoc method supplies is achieved at a substantial cost in predictability and certainty. Moreover, such an approach will require this Court to engage in a constant and continuing supervision of defamation litigation throughout the country. See Time, Inc. v. Pape, —— U.S. ——, —— (1971) (Harlan, J., dissenting); Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 171 (Black, J., concurring).

Undoubtedly, ad hoc balancing may be appropriate in some circumstances that involve First Amendment problems. See, e.g., Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516 (1960); Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School Dist., 393 U.S. 503 (1969). But in view of the shortcomings of my Brother Brennan's test, defamation of a private individual by the mass media is not one of the occasions for unfettered ad hoc balancing. A generally applicable resolution is available that promises to provide an adequate balance between the interest in protecting individuals from defamation and the equally basic interest in protecting freedom of the press.

II

As the plurality recognizes here and has recognized as the basic premise of the New York Times principle, the threat that defamation law presents for the values encompassed in the concept of freedom of the press is that of self censorship.[29] Our notions of liberty require a free and vigorous press that presents what it believes to be information of interest or importance; not timorous, afraid of an error that leaves it open to liability for hundreds of thousands of dollars. The size of the potential judgment that may be rendered against the press must be the most significant factor in producing self censorship—a judgment like the one rendered against Metromedia would be fatal to many smaller publishers.[30]

The judgments that may be entered in defamation cases are unlike those that may be entered in most litigation since the bulk of the award is given to punish the defendant or to compensate for presumed damages. Here the jury awarded Mr. Rosenbloom $725,000 in punitive damages.[31] This huge sum was not given to compensate him for any injury but to punish Metromedia. The concept of punitive or exemplary damages was first articulated in Huckle v. Money, 2 Wils 206 (K. B. 1763)—one of the general warrant cases. There Lord Camden found that the power to award such damages was inherent in the jury's exercise of uncontrolled discretion in the awarding of damages. See 1 T. Sedgwich, Damages § 345–350 (9th ed. 1912). Today these damages are rationalized as a way to punish the wrongdoer and to admonish others not to err. See Morris, Punitive Damages In Tort Cases, 44 Harv. L. Rev. 1172 (1931). Thus they serve the same function as criminal penalties and are in effect private fines. Unlike criminal penalties, however, punitive damages are not awarded within discernible limits but can be awarded in almost any amount. Since there is not even an attempt to offset any palpable loss and since these damages are the direct product of the ancient theory of unlimited jury discretion, the only limit placed on juries in awarding punitive damages is that the damages not be "excessive" and in some jurisdictions, that they bear some relationship to the amount of compensatory damages awarded.[32] See H. Oleck, Damages to Persons and Property § 275, at 557–560 (1955). The manner in which unlimited discretion may be exercised is plainly unpredictable. And fear of the extensive awards that may be given under the doctrine must necessarily produce the impingement on freedom of the press recognized in New York Times.

In addition to the huge awards that may be given under the label of punitive or exemplary damages, other doctrines in the law of defamation allow substantial damages without even an offer of evidence that there was actually injury. See Montgomery v. Dennison, 363 Pa. 255, 69 A. 2d 520 (1949); Restatement of Torts § 621 (1938). These doctrines create a legal presumption that substantial injuries "normally flow" from defamation. There is no requirement that there be even an offer of proof that there was in fact financial loss, physical or emotional suffering, or that the plaintiff's standing in the community was diminished. The effect is to give juries essentially unlimited discretion and thus give the jury much the same power they exercise under the labels of punitive or exemplary damages. The impingement upon free speech is the same no matter what label is attached.

The unlimited discretion exercised by juries in awarding punitive and presumed damages compounds the problem of self-censorship that necessarily results from the awarding of huge judgments. This discretion allows juries to penalize heavily the unorthodox and the unpopular and exact little from others. Such free wheeling discretion presents obvious and basic threats to society's interest in freedom of the press. And the utility of the discretion in fostering society's interest in protecting individuals from defamation is at best vague and uncertain. These awards are not to compensate victims; they are only windfalls. Certainly, the large judgments that can be awarded admonish the particular defendant affected as well as other potential transgressors not to publish defamation. The degree of admonition—the amount of the judgment in relation to the defamor's means—is not, however, tied to any concept of what is necessary to deter future conduct nor is there even any way to determine that the jury has considered the culpability of the conduct involved in the particular case. Thus the essence of the discretion is unpredictability and uncertainty.

[30] The jury awarded Mr. Rosenbloom $25,000 in general damages and $725,000 in punitive damages. The District Court reduced the punitive damages to $250,000 on remittitur.

[31] See n. 6, supra.

[32] Most jurisdictions in this country recognize the concept of punitive or exemplary damages. Four States—Illinois, Massachusetts, Nebraska, and Washington—apparently do not recognize the doctrine. In Louisiana and Indiana the doctrine has limited applicability. See H. Oleck, Damages to Persons and Property § 269, at 541 (1955).

The threats to society's interest in freedom of the press that are involved in punitive and presumed damages can largely be eliminated by restricting the award of damages to proven, actual injuries. The jury's wide ranging discretion will largely be eliminated since the award will be based on essentially objective, discernable factors. And the self-censorship that results from the uncertainty created by the discretion as well as the self-censorship resulting from the fear of large judgments themselves would be reduced. At the same time society's interest in protecting individuals from defamation will still be fostered. The victims of the defamation will be compensated for their real injuries. They will not be, however, assuaged far beyond their wounds. And, there will be a substantial although imprecise and imperfect admonition to avoid future defamation by imposing the requirement that there be compensation for actual damages.

My Brother Harlan argues that it is unnecessary to go so far. Although he recognizes the dangers involved in failing "to confine jury verdicts . . . within any ascertainable limits," Mr. Justice Harlan suggests that on a finding of actual malice punitive damages may be awarded if they "bear a reasonable and purposeful relation to the actual harm done." My Brother Harlan envisions jurors being instructed [33] to consider the deterrent function of punitive damages and to try to gear the punitive damages awarded in some undetermined way to actual injury. Apparently, the jury under the suprvision of the court would weigh the content of the speech and the surrounding circumstances—inter alia, the position of the plaintiff, the wealth of the defendant, and the nature of the instrument of publication—on the scale of their values and determine what amount is necessary in light of the various interests involved. Since there would be no objective standard by which to measure the jury's decision there would be no predetermined limit of jury discretion and all of the threats to freedom of the press involved in such discretion would remain. The chant of some new incantation will of course provide clear authority for courts to substitute their values for the jury's and remake the decision. If this is what my Brother Harlan envisions, he is merely moving the ad hoc balancing from the question of fault to the question of damages.

I believe that the appropriate resolution of the clash of societal values here is to restrict damages to actual losses. See, Hill, The Bill of Rights and the Supervisory Power, 69 Col. L. Rev. 181, 191 n. 62 (1969). Of course, damages can be awarded for more than direct pecuniary loss but they must be related to some proven harm. See Wright, Defamation, Privacy and the Public's Right to Know: A National Problem and a New Approach, 46 Tex. L. Rev. 630, 648 (1968). If awards are so limited in cases involving private individuals—persons first brought to public attention by the defamation that is the subject of the lawsuit—it will be unnecessary to rely, as both the plurality and to some extent Mr. Justice Harlan do, on somewhat elusive concepts [34] of the degree of fault and unnecessary, for constitutional purposes, to engage in ad hoc balancing of the competing interests involved.[35] States would be essentially free to continue the evolution of the common law of defamation and to articulate whatever fault standard best suits the State's need.[36]

[33] "[A] jury instruction is not abracadabra. It is not a magical incantation the slightest deviation from which will break the spell. Only its poorer examples are formalistic codes recited by a trial judge to please appellate masters. At its best, it is simple, rugged communication from a trial judge to a jury of ordinary people, entitled to be appraised in terms of its net effects." Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 418 (1967) (Fortas, J., dissenting).

[34] See n. 9, supra.

[35] Of course, reliance on limiting awards to compensation for actual loss will require some review of the facts of particular cases. But that review will be limited to essentially objectively determinable issues; the contents of the publication will not have to be considered.

[36] Leaving States free to impose liability when defamation is found to be the result of negligent conduct, should make it somewhat more likely that a private person will have a meaningful forum in which to vindicate his reputation. If the standard of care is higher, it would seem that publishers will be more likely to assert the defense of truth than simply contend that they did not breach the standard.

The only constitutional caveat should be that absolute or strict liability like uncontrolled damages and private fines cannot be used.[37] The effect of imposing liability without fault is to place "the printed, writen, or spoken word in the same class with the use of explosives or the keeping of dangerous animals." W. Prosser, The Law of Torts 792 (3d ed. 1964). Clearly, this is inconsistent with the concepts of freedom of the press.

Thus in this case I would reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit and remand the case for a determination of whether Mr. Rosenbloom can show any actual loss.

Before Bazelon, Chief Judge, Wilbur K. Miller, Senior Circuit Judge, and Wright, Circuit Judge.

Bazelon, Chief Judge:

In these appeals we affirm a ruling of the Federal Communications Commission requiring radio and television stations which carry cigarette advertising to devote a significant amount of broadcast time to presenting the case against cigarette smoking. This holding rests on negative answers to the following principal questions:

(I) whether in the Cigarette Labeling Act of 1965 Congress preempted the field of regulation addressed to the health problem posed by cigarette smoking so as to deny the FCC any authority it otherwise had to issue its cigarette ruling (infra, pp. 1087–1091);

(II) if not so forbidden, whether the ruling is nonetheless unauthorized (infra, pp. 1091–1099, either

(A) because the Commission has no authority to regulate broadcast content (infra, pp. 1093–1096), or

(B) because any authority over program content which the Commission may have cannot support a ruling of this kind (infra, pp. 1096–1099); and

(III) if neither forbidden nor unauthorized, whether the ruling is unconstitutional (infra, pp. 1099–1103), either

(A) because the First Amendment permits no regulation of program content (infra, pp. 1099–1101), or

(B) because the cigarette ruling in particular violates the First Amendment (infra, pp. 1101–1103).

The history of the cigarette ruling dates to December 1966, when citizen John F. Banzhaf, III asked WCBS–TV to provide free time in which anti-smokers might respond to the pro-smoking views he said were implicit in the cigarette commercials it broadcast.[1] Although he cited several specific commercial messages,

---

[1] Letter from John F. Banzhaf, III to Television Station WCBS-TV, December 1, 1966.

Banzhaf's target included "all cigarette advertisements which by their portrayals of youthful or virile-looking or sophisticated persons enjoying cigarettes in interesting and exciting situations deliberately seek to create the impression and present the point of view that smoking is socially acceptable and desirable, manly, and a necessary part of a rich full life."

He said this point of view raised one side of a "controversial issue of public importance" and concluded that under the FCC's fairness doctrine, WCBS was under obligation to "affirmatively endeavor to make [its] * * * facilities available for the expression of contrasting viewpoints held by responsible elements. * * *"

WCBS replied that it had broadcast several news and information programs presenting the facts about the smoking-health controversy, as well as five public service announcements of the American Cancer Society aired free of charge during recent months.[2] On the basis of these broadcasts it was confident that "its coverage of the health ramifications of smoking has been fully consistent with the fairness doctrine." But it doubted in any event that "the fairness doctrine can properly be applied to commercial announcements solely and clearly aimed at selling products and services. * * *"

Thereupon, Banzhaf forwarded the correspondence to the Federal Communications Commission under cover of a complaint that the station was violating the fairness doctrine.[3] And thereby hangs the following legal tale.

The Commission sustained the Banzhaf complaint. In a letter dated June 2, 1967,[4] it agreed that the cited cigarette commercials "present the point of view that smoking is 'socially acceptable and desirable, manly, and a necessary part of a rich full life,' "[5] and, as such, invoke the fairness doctrine. It said in part:

> We stress that our holding is limited to this product—cigarettes. Governmental and private reports (e.g., the 1964 Report of the Surgeon General's Committee) and congressional action (e.g., the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act of 1965) assert that normal use of this product can be a hazard to the health of millions of persons. The advertisements in question clearly promote the use of a particular cigarette as attractive and enjoyable. Indeed, they understandably have no other purpose. We believe that a station which presents such advertisements has the duty of informing its audience of the other side of this controversial issue of public importance—that, however enjoyable, such smoking may be a hazard to the smoker's health.[6]

The Commission refused, however, to require "equal time" for the anti-smoking position and emphasized that "the type of programming and the amount and nature of time to be afforded is a matter for the good faith, reasonable judgment of the licensee. * * * " But it directed stations which carry cigarette commercials to provide "a significant amount of time for the other viewpoint. * * * " And by way of illustration it suggested they might discharge their responsibilities by presenting "each week * * * a number of the public-service announcements of the American Cancer Society or HEW in this field."[7]

In response to numerous petitions and requests for reconsideration, the Commission affirmed its ruling in a lengthy Memorandum Opinion.[8] It rejected contentions that the fairness doctrine is unconstitutional and that the cigarette ruling is precluded by the Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act of 1965. The opinion did make clear that cigarette advertising in general, not any particular commercials, necessarily conveys the controversial view that smoking is a good thing.[9] But the Commission stressed again that its ruling was "limited to this product—cigarettes" and disclaimed any intention "to imply that any appeal to the Commission by a vocal minority will suffice to classify advertising of a product as controversial and of public importance." [8] Television Station WCBS–TV ("Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine to Cigarette Advertising"), 9 F.C.C. 2d 921 (1967), hereinafter cited as "Cigarette Advertising."

[9] The Commission explained that it could make its ruling without having before it the text of the particular commercials cited in Banzhaf's complaint, because the controversial issue was not whether smoking is dangerous to health but whether it is desirable. Id. at 946 n. 30. And see id. at 939. The Commission said it had been cited to "no example of a cigarette commercial that does not portray the use of the particular cigarette as attractive and enjoyable as well as encourage people to smoke," and found it "difficult to conceive of one [which would not do so]." Id. at 938.

While defending its failure to provide interested persons an opportunity to be heard before issuing its ruling, the Commission emphasized that any procedural lapse was cured by its exhaustive consideration of the many petitions for review. Finally, it concluded that, "the specifics of the Fairness Doctrine" aside, its ruling was required by the public interest.[11]

Subsequently, in response to a request for clarification, the Commission ruled that stations which carry cigarette advertising are under no obligation to provide the cigarette companies free time in which to respond to broadcast claims that smoking endangers health.[12]

In this review proceeding, the Commission is challenged at virtually every point. Mr. Banzhaf complains that the anti-smoking forces should have been granted equal time. Petitioners Station WTRF-TV, the National Association of Broadcasters, The Tobacco Institute, and eight cigarette manufacturers (hereinafter "petitioners"), all of whose appeals have been consolidated, complain of almost everything else. They are supported by Intervenors CBS and NBC-AB - WLLE Inc. The Commission is supported by the interventions of the American Tuberculosis Association and the ubiquitous Mr. Banzhaf.

We turn now to the issues these legal armies present for our consideration.

I. THE CIGARETTE LABELING ACT

[1] We are confronted at the outset by the contention that the Commission's action is precluded by the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act of 1965.[13] That Act requires cigarette manufacturers and importers to print on each pack the warning "Caution: Cigarette Smoking May Be Hazardous to Your Health" and provides that: "no statement relating to smoking and health shall be required in the advertising of any cigarettes the packages of which are labeled in conformity with the provisions of this Act.[14]
Since the Commission's ruling does not require the inclusion of any "statement * * * in the advertising of any cigarettes," but rather directs stations which advertse cigarettes to present "the other side" each week, it does not violate the letter of the Act.

But petitioners contend that, though Congress said only "no statement shall be required * * * in * * * advertising," it meant to forbid any regulation addressed to the smoking-health problem except the Federal Trade Commission's specifically exempted power to police false and misleading advertising.[15] In support of this proposition, they refer us primarily to the Act's Declaration of Policy, in which Congress asserts a purpose to: establish a comprehenisve Federal program to deal with cigarette labeling and advertising with respect to any relationship between smoking and health, whereby—(1) the public may be adequately informed that cigarette smoking may be hazardous to health by inclusion of a warning to that effect on each package of cigarettes; and (2) commerce and the national economy may be (A) protected to the maximum extent consistent with this declared policy and (B) not impeded by diverse, nonuniform, and confusing cigarette labeling and advertising regulations with respect to any relationship between smoking and health.[16]
From this declaration and from assorted snippets of legislative history, they conclude that Congress has definitively balanced the conflicting interests of the health of the public and the health of the economy and determined—in effect as a matter of law—that the public will be "adequately informed" on the smoking-and-health issue until July, 1969,[17] without any further governmental requirements.

[12] Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine to Cigarette Advertising, 10 F.C.C. 2d 16 (1967)

[14] Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act of 1965 (hereinafter "Act") § 5(b), 15 U.S.C. § 1334(b) (Supp. 1966).

[15] Section 5(c) of the Act states:

> "Except as is otherwise provided * * *, nothing in this Act shall be construed to limit, restrict, expand, or otherwise affect, the authority of the Federal Trade Commission with respect to unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the advertising of cigarettes * * *."

15 U.S.C. § 1334(c) (Supp. 1966).

[17] Section 10 of the Act provides that the provisions "which affect the regulation of advertising" shall terminate on July 1, 1969. 15 U.S.C. § 1339 (Supp. 1966).

The Commission, on the other hand, thought its ruling implemented a congressional policy of promoting intensive smoker-education during the life of the Act as an alternative to the "drastic step" of requiring warnings in every cigarette advertisement. Its opinion cites the express reliance in both House and Senate Reports on the anti-smoking campaigns of public and private groups as a reason for deferring stronger Congressional action.[18] And it notes that Congress itself appropriated $2 million to fund the extensive informational activities in this area of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.[19]

This evidence does not establish unequivocally that Congress did not intend to rely exclusively on such non-coercive educational efforts to inform the public. Congress expressed no purpose in the Act of informing the public of anything except the bare fact that "cigarette smoking may be hazardous to health." Its prescribed warnings do that much and no more. They merely flash danger signals without either particularizing the danger or providing facts on which it may be appraised.

But the anti-smoking campaigns are scarcely so pervasive or so well-funded that additional information could be regarded as mere surfeit. Accordingly, if we are to adopt petitioners' analysis, we must conclude that Congress legislated to curtail the potential flow of information lest the public learn too much about the hazards of smoking for the good of the tobacco industry and the economy. We are loathe to impute such a purpose to Congress absent a clear expression. Where a controversial issue with potentially grave consequences is left to each individual to decide for himself, the need for an abundant and ready supply of relevant information is too obvious to need belaboring.

[20] In the present case we find no such clear expression of restrictive intent. On the contrary, these are positive indications that Congress's "comprehensive program" was directed at the relatively narrow specific issue of regulation of "cigarette labeling and advertising." The Act was in fact passed in response to a pending Federal Trade Commission rule which would have required warnings both on packages and in all advertising.[20] Subjected to competing pressures and uncertain of the full extent of the health hazard, Congress apparently settled on half of the FTC's proposed loaf, shelved the other half for four years,[21] and expressly disclaimed any intent to affect other FTC policies or powers.[22] Nothing in the Act indicates that Congress had any intent at all with respect to other types of regulation by other agencies—much less that it specifically meant to foreclosure all such regulation.[23] If it meant to do anything so dramatic, it might reasonably be expected to have said so directly—especially where it was careful to include a section entitled "Preemption" specifically forbidding designated types of regulatory action.[24]

[3–5] In short, we think the Cigarette Labeling Act represents the balance drawn between the narrow purpose of warning the public "that cigarette smoking may be hazardous to health" and the interests of the economy. In that reckoning, the question of the public's need for information about the nature, extent, and certainty of the danger was left out of the scales, and so is left unaffected, except incidentally, by the result. Congress may reasonably have concluded that a warning on each pack was adequate warning.[25] It surely did not think the warnings were themselves adequate information. And we find no sufficiently persuasive evidence that Congress hoped to impede the flow of adequate information for fear that, if the public knew all the facts, too many of them would stop smoking.[26]

[18] The Senate Commerce Committee concluded:

> "Considering the combined impact of voluntary limitations on advertising under the Cigarette Advertising Code, the extensive smoking education campaigns now underway, and the compulsory warning on the package which will be required under the provisions of this bill, it was the Committee's unanimous judgment that no warning in cigarette advertising should be required pending the showing that these vigorous, but less drastic, steps have not adequately alerted the public to the potential hazard from smoking."

[19] Cigarette Advertising, supra note 8, at 933.

[20] On June 22, 1964, the Federal Trade Commission promulgated a proposed regulation requiring warnings on cigarette packs from January 1, 1965, and warnings in advertising as well from July 1, 1965, unless the package warnings and voluntary advertising reforms had changed the circumstances by then. 29 Fed. Reg. 8325 (1964). The next day the House Commerce Committee began hearings on various cigarette legislation which had been introduced in the House during the 88th Congress. Those hearings and that Congress adjourned without action, but the FTC acceded to the request of Chairman Harris to postpone the effective date of the package-warning rule to July 1, 1965, so that the new Congress might legislate. 29 Fed. Reg. 15570 (1964). The 89th Congress rushed into the breach with the Cigarette Labeling Act, and as a result the FTC rule was stillborn.

[22] Act, § 5(c), supra note 15.

[23] The only reference to other agencies besides the FTC in the entire Act is the declaration in Section 10 that the termination in 1969 of the provisions affecting the regulation of advertising "shall not be construed as limiting, expanding, or otherwise affecting the jurisdiction or authority which the Federal Trade Commission or any other Federal agency had prior to the date of the enactment of this Act." 15 U.S.C. § 1339 (Supp. 1966). Since all other agencies are necessarily included in the blanket ban on required warnings in advertising, this negative provision is not evidence that the Act sweeps more broadly than its words import.

[24] Act, § 5, 15 U.S.C. § 1334 (Supp. 1966).

This relatively narrow reading of the Act is not in conflict with its declared objective of protecting commerce and the national economy against "diverse, non-uniform, and confusing cigarette labeling and advertising regulations with respect to any relationship between smoking and health."[27] Congress patently did not want cigarette manufacturers harassed by conflicting affirmative requirements with respect to the content of their advertising. In addition, it evidently decided that the case against smoking was not yet so overwhelming as to warrant compelling the cigarette companies to dig their own graves by neutralizing their own advertising messages.[28] Even if these policies implicitly preempt regulations of advertising substantially equivalent to the FTC's proposed required warnings,[29] they do not exclude a single, uniform regulation of broadcasters designed to inform the public.

II. THE COMMISSION'S AUTHORITY UNDER THE PUBLIC INTEREST STANDARD OF THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT

A fundamental question, of course, is whether the Commission's ruling, though not expressly forbidden by statute, is within the scope of its delegated authority.

[25] Too many bare warnings might result in an uninformed and possibly unnecessary stampede away from cigarettes. While we will not assume that Congress wished to protect the economy at the expense of life and health, it clearly did wish to protect it to the maximum extent compatible with intelligent individual decisions on the health issue. Congress gave the benefit of every doubt to the possibility that the benefits of smoking might outweigh the potential danger to health; but that is not to say that it wished to conceal from the public the true extent of the danger. It is true that the anticigarette broadcasts required by the Commission's ruling may include uninformative propaganda as well as hard information. That possibility is a necessary consequence of the Commission's proper reluctance to dictate the content of broadcast material. See Part II, infra. But the ruling is reasonably designed to promote the diffusion of information; it is plainly not the substantial equivalent of the required "warnings" in advertisement which Congress has prohibited

[26] Apart from the declaration of policy to establish a "comprehensive" program—which is meaningful only after we discover what subject matter is comprehended—petitioners rely primarily on the broad scope of the congressional hearings from which the Act emerged. The Senate Commerce Committee heard wide-ranging testimony on all aspects of the smoking-health controversy, including the views of the FCC. Congress also considered proposals for more drastic congressional action than that taken by the Act. But the fact that Congress considered and declined to adopt broader legislation does not establish that it intended to bar otherwise-authorized agency action under established powers and duties.

Petitioners also make much of the fact that the FCC, through its Chairman, specifically told Congress that it had no present plans for regulatory action addressed to the smoking-health problem and that it preferred the across-the-board approach taken by the FTC. While it is possible that had the FCC then anticipated its cigarette ruling, Congress would have expressly prohibited it, that possibility must remain in the realm of speculation. We must decide questions of legislative intent by the lights we have, not by those we might have had.

Nor do we think the FCC's 1964 disclaimer of intent to deal with the cigarette problem deprives it of authority it would otherwise have had to do so now. It is not suggested that the FCC acted in bad faith. The 1964 statement came at a time when the FTC was conspicuously taking the lead oar in attacking the problem on a media-wide front. The FCC may well have been reluctant in those circumstances to place a special burden on the communications industry. Primarily because of the Cigarette Labeling Act, the FTC's broad attack is now stalled. Supra, note 20. If the Act itself does not preempt FCC regulation, we see no reason why the FCC may not take the effects of the Act into account in assessing the need for its own action.

[28] In the Congressional hearings on proposed cigarette legislation, tobacco industry spokesmen appeared to view the FTC's rule requiring them to include warnings in their advertising as uniquely obnoxious. One of them, for example, told the House Commerce Committee that > the insistence upon a warning in advertising, in addition to the demand for a warning on labels, is punitive in nature. The right to advertise—an essential commercial right—is virtually destroyed if a manufacturer is required in every advertisement to disparage the product.

Hearings before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 284 (1964).

[29] The Commission thought the Act implicitly forbade a requirement that stations present warning statements immediately "adjacent" to each cigarette commercial. We need not decide whether such a requirement, though not a regulation of advertising, is so nearly identical to such a regulation in purpose and effect as to fall within the statute's prohibition.

The ruling originated in response to a "fairness doctrine" complaint and held that the fairness doctrine applied to cigarette advertising. But in its opinion affirming the ruling, the Commission also asserted that it "clearly has the authority to make this public interest ruling" under the public interest standard of the Communications Act and relied upon "the licensee's statutory obligation to operate in the public interest." [30]

Last year in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC,[31] we upheld the fairness doctrine in the face of arguments that it was unauthorized and unconstitutional. Since then, in Radio Television News Directors v. FCC,[32] the Seventh Circuit has held that the Commission's personal attack rules violate the First Amendment and, in so doing, has cast some doubt on the constitutionality of the underlying fairness doctrine.[33] These issues are now to be resolved by the Supreme Court.

In part for this reason, we do not think protracted discussion of the fairness doctrine will materially advance our inquiry. It is clear to us that, even if incorporated into the fairness doctrine, the ruling before us is to all intents a novel application. In only one instance has the Commission previously held the advertising of a consumer product subject to the rule that broadcasters' presentations of controversial public issues must be fair and balanced.[34] The narrow issue presented by the facts of that case was whether a station in the temperance belt which advertised alcoholic beverages could, consistently with the principles now known as the fairness doctrine, refuse to accept anti-liquor advertising from temperance groups.[35] The case has not been followed in the twenty years since it was decided. It is not in any event a clear precedent for a ruling which instructs stations to broadcast opposition to their paid commercials regardless of whether opponents buy—or even request—such broadcast time. In addition, except for the personal attack rules struck down by the Seventh Circuit,[36] we know of no case in which the Commission has so specifically defined the stations' duties under the fairness doctrine.[37]

We also note that elsewhere the Commission has been hesitant to invoke the fairness doctrine where a controversial issue is raised only by implication.[38] Finally, the Commission itself concluded that its main point would be lost if the legal debate concentrated too intensely on the "specifics of the fairness doctrine." [39]

Ed. 2d 458 (1967), argument postponed pending decision of the Seventh Circuit in Radio Television News Directors Ass'n v. United States (infra note 32), 390 U.S. 916, 88 S. Ct. 837, 19 L. Ed. 2d 982 (1968).

[32] 400 F. 2d 1002 (7 Cir., decided September 10, 1968).

[33] The Court of Appeals distinguished the personal attack rules from the underlying fairness doctrine on two grounds. First, the rules represent an unusual particularization of the doctrine, since they impose detailed tests for determining which individual broadcasts trigger the stations' duty to provide reply time and since, unlike the cigarette ruling, they also leave the stations little discretion as to how that duty may be fulfilled. Second, the personal attack rules are enforceable by penalties for individual infractions rather than solely by consideration of a station's overall performance in the proceedings for renewal of a license. Radio Television News Directors Ass'n v. United States (FCC), supra note 32 (400 F. 2d pp. 1013–1014). Nonetheless, the court expressly refused to decide the constitutionality of the fairness doctrine itself. Id., 400 F. 2d 1017. It did decide that the objective of a fair and balanced presentation of issues of public importance does not justify rules which are likely to inhibit public debate on political issues and might, by their vagueness, set up the Commission as a de facto censor of individual editorial and political broadcasts. This holding cuts very near the heart of the fairness doctrine. See Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F.C.C. 1246 (1949).

[34] Petition of Sam Morris, 11 F.C.C. 197 (1946). This opinion in fact predates the first formal articulation of the policies now known as the "fairness doctrine" in the 1949 Report of the Commission in the Matter of Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, supra note 33. But the basic requirement of fair and balanced presentation of controversial issues of public importance dates from decisions of the old Radio Commission and from the early rulings of the FCC. See Red Lion Broadcasting v. FCC, supra note 31, 127 U.S. App. D.C. at 138–139, 381 F. 2d at 917–918, and cases cited therein.

[35] The Commission observed, "[I]t can at least be said that the advertising of alcoholic beverages can raise substantial issues of public importance." and concluded that the issue of whether or not to drink "may assume the proportions of a controverted issue of public importance." 11 F.C.C. at 199. It did not, however, deny renewal of the respondent station's license for failure to provide time to the temperance advocates.

[36] Radio Television News Directors Ass'n v. United States (FCC), supra note 32.

[37] The Commission has, upon rare occasion, identified specific issues it regards as controversial. E.g., Petition of Sam Morris, supra note 34; Robert Harold Scott, 3 P & F Radio Reg. 259 (1946). But it has not previously gone so far as to prescribe the frequency with which opposing views must be broadcast.

[38] The Commission has refused to require reply time for atheists who wish to respond to the implicit theism of broadcast church services. Mrs. Madalyn Murray, 5 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 263 (1965). But see, Robert Harold Scott, supra note 37.

[39] Cigarette Advertising, supra note 8, 9 F.C.C. 2d at 949.

None of the novel aspects of the ruling, of course, precludes an extension of the fairness doctrine at this time. But the extension must, like the doctrine itself, find its authority in the public interest standard. Thus, whether the ruling is viewed as a new application of the fairness doctrine or as an independent public interest ruling, the ultimate question is the same. Moreover, in view of the constitutional attack on the doctrine, the specific question of greatest long-term importance may be whether the cigarette ruling can stand on its own feet.

In fact, we think the best statement of the Commission's holding and rationale is contained in the summary paragraph introducing the "Conclusions" section of its opinion:

> There is, we believe, some tendency to miss the main point at issue by concentration on labels such as the specifics of the Fairness Doctrine or by conjuring up a parade of "horrible" extensions of the ruling. The ruling is really a simple and practical one, required by the public interest. The licensee, who has a duty "to operate in the public interest" * * * is presenting commercials urging the consumption of a product whose normal use has been found by the Congress and the Government to represent a serious potential hazard to public health. Ordinarily the question presented would be how the carriage of such commercials is consistent with the obligation to operate in the public interest. In view of the Legislative history of the Cigarette Labeling Act, that question is one reserved for judgment of the Congress upon the basis of the studies and reports submitted to it. * * * But there is, we think, no question of the continuing obligation of a licensee who presents such commercials to devote a significant amount of time to informing his listeners of the other side of the matter—that however enjoyable smoking may be, it represents a habit which may cause or contribute to the earlier death of the user. This obligation stems not from any esoteric requirements of a particular doctrine but from the simple fact that the public interest means nothing if it does not include such a responsibility.[40]

The fairness doctrine, we think, serves chiefly to put flesh on these policy bones by providing a familiar mold to define the general contours of the obligation imposed.

The attack on the alleged statutory authority for this "public interest" ruling takes two forms: (1) a general denial that the Commission has any authority to supervise the content of broadcasting under the public interest standard: and (2) an argument that any delegation of the power to make ad hoc public interest determinations of this kind is invalid for want of adequate limiting standards.

A. The Commission's authority over broadcast content in general

Nothing in the Communications Act of 1934[41] expressly grants the Commission any general authority over programming. The most relevant provisions go no further than to authorize it to grant and renew broadcast licenses according to the dictates of the "public interest, convenience, and necessity."[42] A case could be made, as an abstract proposition, that this licensing power is limited to policing the traffic over the airwaves to prevent interference between stations and perhaps to assure a minimum level of technical competence. If the question were res nova, that case would receive substantial support from the Supreme Court decisions requiring a clear mandate for regulatory activity which brushes closely against sensitive constitutional areas.[43]

[6] But the argument was in fact made and rejected long ago in National Broadcasting Company v. United States.[44] Justice Frankfurter, speaking for the Court, said in part:

> "An important element of public interest and convenience affecting the issue of a license is the ability of the licensee to render the best practicable service to the community reached by his broadcasts." Federal Communications Comm. v. Sanders Bros. Radio Station, 309 U.S. 470, 475, 60 S.Ct 693, 697, 84 L.Ed. 869, 1037. The Commission's licensing function cannot be discharged, therefore, merely by finding that there are no technological objec> tions to the granting of a license. If the criterion of "public interest" were limited to such matters, how could the Commission choose between two applicants for the same facilities, each of whom is financially and technically qualified to operate a station? Since the very inception of federal regulation by radio [sic], comparative considerations as to the services to be rendered have governed the application of the standard of "public interest, convenience, or necessity." * * *

The avowed aim of the Communications Act of 1934 was to secure the maximum benefits of radio to all the people of the United States. To that end Congress endowed the Communications Commission with cmoprehensive powers to promote and realize the vast potentialities of radio. * * *

These provisions, individually and in the aggregate, preclude the notion that the Commission is empowered to deal only with technical and engineering impediments to the "larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest."[45]

In fact, neither courts nor Commission have thought it had to make its decisions among competing applicants blindfolded to the content of their programs.[46] Both the old Radio Commission and the FCC have likewise refused to renew licenses on the basis of past programming not in the public interest,[47] and this Court affirmed such a refusal as long ago as 1931.[48] If agency power to designate programming "not in the public interest" is a slippery slope, the Commission and the courts started down it too long ago to go back to the top now unless Congress or the Constitution sends them. But Congress has apparently specifically endorsed this understanding of the public interest.[49] And whatever the limits imposed by the First Amendment, we do not think it requires eradicating every trace of a programming component from the public interest standard.[50]

[48] In KFKB Broadcasting Ass'n, supra note 47, this court upheld the denial of a license to a station which regularly broadcast a program in which a doctor diagnosed illnesses and prescribed medicines on the basis of symptoms described in listeners' letters. The grounds for denial were both that the doctor, who controlled the station, was using it for his own private interests and also that the "medical question box" program was "inimical to the public health and safety, and for that reason [was] not in the public interest." 60 App.D.C. at 80, 47 F. 2d at 672. The court said:

> "It is apparent, we think, that the [broadcasting] business is impressed with a public interest and that, because the number of available broadcasting frequencies is limited, the Commission is necessarily called upon to consider the character and quality of the service to be rendered. In considering an application for a renewal of the license, an important consideration is the past conduct of the applicant, for " by their fruits shall ye know them." Matt. VII:20."

[49] In 1959, Congress amended the provision requiring broadcasters to provide equal time to opponents of candidates for public office who use their stations, 47 U.S.C. § 315 (1964), in order to exempt bona fide newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, etc., from that requirement. In so doing it included the proviso that nothing in the exemption:

> "shall be construed as relieving broadcasters, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events, from the obligation imposed upon them under this chapter to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance."

73 Stat. 557 (1959), 47 U.S.C. § 315(a) (1964) (emphasis added). At the very least, this language appears to be an acknowlegment of and acquiescence in the settled Commission and judicial construction that the public interest standard applies to program content.

[50] Infra, Part III.

The power to refuse a license on grounds of past or proposed programming necessarily entails some power to define the stations' public interest obligations with respect to programming. It is this power to specify material which the public interest requires or forbids to be broadcast that carries the seeds of the general authority to censor denied by the Communications Act[51] and the First Amendment alike. But elementary canons of administrative and constitutional law prevent the Commission from terminating a license without giving reasons or from condemning a station's overall programming as inimical to the public interest without identifying the offending material and particularizing the public interest. And if the Commission must explain its view of the public interest when it denies or revokes a license, it may surely give advance notice of its views by way of an official ruling which is subject to judicial review. Indeed, in some cases fairness to the stations may require some advance warning of their responsibilities.

[7] Thus, in applying the public interest standard to programming, the Commission walks a tightrope between saying too much and saying too little. In most areas it has resolved this dilemma by imposing only general affirmative duties—e.g., to strike a balance between the various interests of the community,[52] or to provide a reasonable amount of time for the presentation of programs devoted to the discussion of public issues.[53] The licensee has broad discretion in giving specific content to these duties, and on application for renewal of a license it is understood the Commission will focus on his overall performance and good faith rather than on specific errors it may find him to have made.[54] In practice, the Commission rarely denies licenses for breaches of these duties.[55] Given its long-established authority to consider program content, this general approach probably minimizes the dangers of censorship or pervasive supervision.

In other areas, however, the Commission has on occasion imposed more specific duties or found specific programs or advertisements to be contrary to the public interest.[56] Such rulings must be closely scrutinized lest they carry the Commission too far in the direction of the forbidden censorship. But particularity is not in itself a vice; indeed, in some circumstances it may serve to limit an otherwise impermissibly broad intrusion upon a licensee's individual responsibility for programming.

B. The authority for the cigarette ruling in particular

[8–10] Thus, in the context of the Communications Act as it has long been understood, we do not think that public interest rulings relating to specific program content invariably amount to "censorship" within the meaning of the Act.[57] However, there is high risk that such rulings will reflect the Commission's selection among tastes, opinions, and value judgments, rather than a recognizable public interest. Especially with First Amendment issues lurking in the near background, the "public interest" is too vague a criterion for administrative action unless it is narrowed by definable standards.[58]

[51] Section 326 of the Communications Act of 1934 provides:

> "Nothing in this chapter shall be understood or construed to give the Commission the power of censorship * * *, and no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the Commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication."

[57] See note 51, supra. It is not clear whether Congress originally thought that such rulings as to program content would constitute "censorship." See Note, 46 Harv.L.Rev. 987, 990 (1933). But view of the settled administrative practice of issuing such rulings and opinions, the doubtful issue of construction must be resolved in the negative. See Note, "Regulation of Program Content by the FCC," supra note 46, at 715.

[11] The ruling before us neither forbids nor requires the publication of any specific material. But as an extension of the fairness doctrine it is an unusual limitation of the licensee's discretion. And as an independent public interest ruling it requires independent support. We cannot uphold it merely on the ground that it may reasonably be thought to serve the public interest.

Whatever else it may mean, however, we think the public interest indisputably includes the public health.[59] There is perhaps a broader public consensus on that value, and also on its core meaning, than on any other likely component of the public interest. The power to protect the public health lies at the heart of the states' police power. It has sustained many of the most drastic exercises of that power, including quarantines, condemnations, civil commitments, and compulsory vaccinations. Likewise, public health concerns now support a sizable portion of the civilian federal bureaucracy. The public health has in effect become a kind of basic law, both justifying new extensions of old powers and evoking the legitimate concern of government wherever its regulatory power otherwise extends.

[12] The Radio Commission, predecessor to the FCC, assumed with judicial approval and without question that broadcasting of special medical information was not in the public interest.[60] In the Communications Act of 1934, Congress transferred the Radio Commission's authority to license in the "public interest, convenience and necessity" to the FCC,[61] which has also ruled specific controversial health claims to be not in the public interest.[62] Given the premise that the "public interest" may include some of the content as well as the technical quality of broadcasting, we are satisfied that it includes the public health. But were there any initial doubt, in the absence of evidence to the contrary we think Congress must be deemed to have acquiesced in the determinations to that effect of both Commissions on a matter of such basic and universally recognized importance.

The public health standard removes much of the vagueness and over-breadth attending the standard of the public interest. But we are not prepared to say that the Commission is authorized to condemn every broadcast which might, without arbitrariness or caprice, be thought to pose some danger to the public health. Even the relatively precise concept of the public health is murky at the fringes, and in some cases what is concededly optimal health may be a less important public value than other conflicting interests. Finally, the Commission itself has no special expertise to make it the appropriate arbiter of controversies over whether particular broadcasting is dangerous to health.

[58] The Supreme Court has suggested that the "public interest" standard may be narrowed by interpreting it in the light of "its context * * * the nature of radio transmission and reception, [and] * * * the scope, character, and quality of services * * *." Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Brothers Bond & Mortgage Co., 289 U.S. 266, 285, 53 S. Ct. 627, 636, 77 L. Ed. 1166, 89 A.L.R. 406 (1933). While these criteria may be sufficiently precise administrative standards to govern regulation of technical performance and selection among competing applicants, however, we think they are too amorphous, without more, to support supervision over programming.

[59] Petitioners WTRF-TV and the National Association of Broadcasters argue that, if the FCC has any authority with respect to advertising, it can apply only the more specific standard Congress has established to guide the Federal Trade Commission, which they say is vested with "primary" authority to regulate advertising. Thus, they would limit the FCC's role to policing "unfair methods of competition * * * and unfair or deceptive acts or practices," Federal Trade Commission Act § 5 (1914), 15 U.S.C. § 45(a) (1964), at least absent any considerations peculiar to broadcasting. Their sole authority for that proposition is FCC v. American Broadcasting Co., 347 U.S. 284, 74 S. Ct. 593, 98 L. Ed. 699 (1954) That case, however, is not in point. There, the FCC had adopted regulations disapproving of give-away programs on the ground that they were "lotteries' within the meaning of federal prohibitory statutes. The Supreme Court reversed on the ground that the FCC had misread the criminal statutes, but that reversal did not in itself preclude FCC authority to prohibit such programs as inconsistent with the public interest. SEC v. Chenery Corp., 318 U.S. 80, 63 S. Ct. 454, 87 L. Ed. 626 (1943). In any case, the standard of the Federal Trade Act is applicable only to regulation of advertising. While the obligations imposed under the cigarette ruling arise from and are conditioned upon the broadcasting of cigarette advertising, the ruling does not regulate advertising. Rather, it has the effect of regulating stations which carry advertising by requiring them to inform the public.

But the ruling on cigarette advertising is vulnerable to none of these objections against a broad mandate to the Commission to consider the public health.[63] The danger cigarettes may pose to health is, among others, a danger to life itself. As the Commission emphasized, it is a danger inherent in the normal use of the product, not one merely associated with its abuse or dependent or intervening fortuitous events. It threatens a substantial body of the population, not merely a peculiarly susceptible fringe group. Moreover, the danger, though not established beyond all doubt, is documented by a compelling cumulation of statistical evidence. The only member of the Commission to express doubts about the validity of its ruling had no doubts about the validity of its premise that, in all probability, cigarettes are dangerous to health:[64]

> Cigarette smoking is a substantial hazard to the health of those who smoke which increases both with the number of cigarettes smoked and with the youthfulness when smoking is started. Cigarette smoking increases both the likelihood of the occurrence and the seriousness of the consequences of various types of cancer, of cardiovascular failures and of numerous other pathologies of smokers. These conclusions are established by overwhelming scientific evidence, by the findings of Government agencies, and by Congressional reports and statute. * * * The evidence on this subject is not conclusive, but scientific evidence is never conclusive. All scientific conclusions are probablistic (sic) * * * Furthermore, law does not and cannot demand conclusive proof. Even in a capital case, the law requires only proof beyond a reasonable doubt. * * * The evidence as to the dangers of cigarette smoking to the smoker is clearly beyond a mere preponderance and approaches proof beyond a reasonable doubt.[65]

Finally, the Commission expressly refused to rely on any scientific expertise of its own.[66] Instead, it took the word of the Surgeon General's Advisory Committee,[67] whose findings had already been adopted in substance by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare,[68] the Federal Trade Commission,[69] and the Senate Commerce Committee,[70] and had in addition been recognized and acted upon by Congress itself in the Cigarette Labeling Act.

In these circumstances, the Commission could reasonably determine that news broadcasts, private and governmental educational programs, the information provided by other media, and the prescribed warnings on each cigarette pack, inadequately inform the public of the extent to which its life and health are most probably in jeopardy. The mere fact that information is available, or even that it is actually heard or read, does not mean that it is effectively understood. A man who hears a hundred "yeses" for each "no," when the actual odds lie heavily the other way, cannot be realistically deemed adequately informed. Moreover, since cigarette smoking is psychologically addicting, the confirmed smoker is likely to be relatively unreceptive to information about its dangers: his hearing is dulled by his appetite. And since it is so much harder to stop than not to start, it is crucial that an accurate picture be communicated to those who have not yet begun.

[63] We agree with the Commission that "cigarette advertising presents a unique situation," and we note that the Commission "do[es] not now know" of any other advertised product which would warrant a comparable ruling. Cigarette Advertising, supra note 8, 9 FCC 2d at 943.

[64] The Commission correctly noted that it "is not the proper arbiter of the scientific and medical issue * * * and of course has not sought to resolve it." Id. at 949. But the "controversial issue" to which its ruling is addressed is not whether cigarette smoking is dangerous, but whether, in view of its authoritatively documented dangers, it is desirable:

> "It comes down, we think, to a simple controversial issue: the cigarette commercials are conveying any number of reasons why it appears desirable to smoke, but understandably do not set forth the reasons why it is not desirable to commence or continue smoking. It is the affirmative presentation of smoking as a desirable habit which constitutes the viewpoint others desire to oppose.

[67] On January 11, 1964, the report of the Surgeon General's Advisory Committee concluded that cigarette smoking contributes substantially to mortality from certain specific diseases and to the overall death rate. The Committee recommended that "cigarette smoking is a health hazard of sufficient importance in the United States to warrant appropriate remedial action." Cigarette Advertising, supra note 8, Appendix A at 950.

[68] The Department promptly established the National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health in order, inter alia, to use its professional talents to bring to the Nation—particularly the young—an increasing awareness of the health hazards of cigarette smoking. * * * Id., Appendix A at 951. In 1967, HEW also released the Surgeon General's "Report on Current Information on the Health Consequences of Smoking," which reaffirmed the conclusions of the 1964 Report, supra note 67, on the basis of more than 2,000 subsequent research studies. This report asserted that cigarette smokers have substantially higher death and disability rates than comparable non-smokers and that a substantial number of earlier deaths and disabilities would not have occurred if the victims had never smoked. Id. at 936–937.

[70] While there remain [sic] a substantial number of individual physicians and scientists—the Commerce Committee received testimony from 39 of them—who do not believe that it has been demonstrated scientifically that smoking causes lung cancer or other diseases, no prominent medical or scientific body undertaking a systematic review of the evidence has reached conclusions opposed to those of the Surgeon General's Advisory Committee. S. Rep. No. 195, 89th Cong., 1st sess., p. 3 (1965).

Thus, as a public health measure addressed to a unique danger authenticated by official and congressional action, the cigarette ruling is not invalid on account of its unusual particularity. It is in fact the product singled out for special treatment which justifies the action taken. In view of the potentially grave consequences of a decision to continue—or above all to start—smoking, we think it was not an abuse of discretion for the Commission to attempt to insure not only that the negative view be heard, but that it be heard repeatedly. The Commission has made no effort to dictate the content of the required anti-cigarette broadcasts. It has emphasized that the responsibility for content, source, specific volume, and precise timing rests with the good faith discretion of the licensee.[71]

[13] The cigarette ruling does not convert the Commission into either a censor or a big brother. But we emphasize that our cautious approval of this particular decision does not license the Commission to scan the airwaves for offensive material with no more discriminating a lens than the "public interest" or even the "public health."

III. THE FIRST AMENDMENT

It is difficult to separate the First Amendment question from the question of the Commission's authority. Section 326 of the Communications Act expressly provides that "no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the Commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication." [72] It might reasonably be thought that "the right of free speech," is shorthand for the First Amendment. But since constructions of the First Amendment have broadened since 1934, and inasmuch as the First Amendment argument advanced in this case challenges a long-settled construction of the Act, we treat the constitutional question separately for purposes of analysis.

A. Regulation of broadcast content under the First Amendment in general

[14] Intervenors NBC, et al. argue cogently that the public interest standard cannot constitutionally now include any component of program content. They say the First Amendment obviously would not tolerate administrative supervision of the material published by the newspaper press. The radio press was initially treated differently only because (1) peculiar technical factors require a policeman to prevent interference between different stations, and (2) the then available broadcasting channels were so limited in number that the Commission could hardly ignore all considerations of the nature and quality of programming in choosing among applicants. The first reason does not justify supervision of content, they say, and the second, if ever sufficient, is an anachronism now that the available channels often outnumber the applicants and the broadcasting stations serving most areas far outnumber the newspapers.[73] Accordingly, in their view the First Amendment now limits the Commission's licensing discretion to technological considerations: the content of broadcasting, like that of the publishing press, must be left entirely to the licensees and ultimately to the market.

This argument has considerable force. First Amendment complaints against FCC regulation of content are not adequately answered by mere recitation of the technicaly imposed necessity for some regulation of broadcasting and the conclusory propositions that "the public owns the airwaves" and that a broadcast license is a "revocable privilege." [74] It may well be that some venerable FCC policies cannot withstand constitutional scrutiny in the light of contemporary understanding of the First Amendment and the modern proliferation of broadcasting outlets.

[72] Supra note 51.

[73] See Radio Television News Directors Ass'n v. United States (FCC) supra, note 32, 400 F. 2d pp. 1018–1020, where the Seventh Circuit declared that the historical distinction between press and broadcasting is untenable for First Amendment purposes.

[74] See G. Robinson, The FCC and the First Amendment: Observations on 40 Years of Radio and Television Regulations, 52 Minn. L. Rev. 67, 152 (1967).

On the other hand, we cannot solve such complex questions by replacing one set of shibboleths with another. The First Amendment is unmistakably hostile to governmental controls over the content of the press,[75] but that is not to say that it necessarily bars every regulation which in any way affects what the newspapers publish. Even if it does, there may still be a meaningful distinction between the two media justifying different treatment under the First Amendment. Unlike broadcasting, the written press includes a rich variety of outlets for expression and persuasion, including journals, pamphlets, leaflets, and circular letters, which are available to those without technical skills or deep pockets.[76] Moreover, the broadcasting medium may be different in kind from publishing in way which has particular relevance to the case at hand. Written messages are not communicated unless they are read, and reading requires an affirmative act. Broadcast messages, in contrast, are "in the air." In an age of omnipresent radio, there scarcely breathes a citizen who does not know some part of a leading cigarette jingle by heart. Similarly, an ordinary habitual television watcher can avoid these commercials only by frequently leaving the room, changing the channel, or doing some other such affirmative act. It is difficult to calculate the subliminal impact of this pervasive propaganda, which may be heard even if not listened to, but it may reasonably be thought greater than the impact of the written word.[77]

B. Constitutionality of the cigarette ruling in particular

[15] These considerations are at least sufficient to convince us that we are not obliged simply to "invalidate the entire course of broadcasting development"[78] with no inquiry into the particulars of the ruling before us. Rather, we think the proper approach to the difficult First Amendment issues petitioners raise is to consider them in the context of individual regulatory policies and practices on a case-by-case basis. On this approach, since the narrow public health power which supports the cigarette ruling does not "sweep * * * widely and * * * indiscriminately" across protected freedoms,[79] the constitutional question before us is only whether the Communications Act, construed to authorize a public health ruling in the circumstances of this case, offends the First Amendment. And whatever the constitutional infirmities of other regulations of programming, we are satisfied that the cigarette ruling does not abridge the First Amendment freedoms of speech or press. We reach this conclusion in the light of the following considerations:

(1) The cigarette ruling does not ban any speech. In traditional doctrinal terms, the constitutional argument against it is only that it may have a "chilling effect" on the exercise of First Amendment freedoms by making broadcasters more reluctant to carry cigarette advertising.

(2) The speech which might conceivably be "chilled" by this ruling barely qualifies as constitutionally protected "speech." It is established that some ut-

[75] E.g., Near v. State of Minnesota, ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 51 S. Ct. 625, 75 L. Ed. 1357 (1931).

[76] It has also been suggested that a difference in the working of the market mechanism in the two media may justify a difference in the scope of permissible regulations under the First Amendment. It is in a newspaper's economic interest, it is said, to include features which may appeal only to a limited or specialized audience. The cost of adding a page to include special features is relatively small compared to the advertising and subscription revenue which may be expected from the resulting increase in circulation. But a broadcaster can appeal to only one audience at a time. If he devotes an hour to programs appealing to a minority taste, he foregoes the chance to compete for the greater advertising revenues consequent upon reaching a larger audience. Accordingly, it may be that even newspaper monopolies are more likely than broadcasters to serve the entire public without regulatory prodding. See Note, "Regulation of Program Content by the FCC," supra note 46, at 714. For support from economists for the proposition that broadcasters will compete for the majority audience at the expense even of a sizable minority taste, see J. Dirlam and A. Kahn, The Merits of Reserving the Cost-Savings from Domestic Communications Satellites for Support of Educational Television, 77 Yale L. J. 494, 515–517 (1968).

[77] The effectiveness of the television commercial is hardly disputed, for it alone appeals to both of man's most receptive senses—hearing and seeing. * * * Psychological, memory experiments indicate strongly that people tend to remember advertising messages presented by a combination of visual and auditory methods significantly more than those presented by either method alone. See e.g., Elliott, Memory for Visual Auditory, and Visual-Auditory Material, 29 ARCHIVES OF PSYCHOLOGY No. 199, at 52–54 (1936). [78] Note, "Regulation of Program Content by the FCC," supra note 46, at 715.

terances fall outside the pale of First Amendment concern.[60] Many cases indicate that product advertising is at least less rigorously protected than other forms of speech.[61] Promoting the sale of a product is not ordinarily associated with any of the interests the First Amendment seeks to protect. As a rule, it does not affect the political process, does not contribute to the exchange of ideas, does not provide information on matters of public importance, and is not, except perhaps for the ad-men, a form of individual self-expression. It is rather a form of merchandising subject to limitation for public purposes like other business practices. In the instant case, this argument is not dispositive because the cigarette ruling was premised on the fact that cigarette advertising implicitly states a position on a matter of public controversy. But though this advertising strongly implies that cigarette smoking is a desirable habit, petitioners have correctly insisted that the advertisements in question present no information or arguments in favor of smoking which might contribute to the public debate. Accordingly, even if cigarette commercials are protected speech, we think they are at best a negligible "part of any exposition of ideas, and are of * * * slight social value as a step to truth * * *."[62]

(3) In any event, the danger that even this marginal "speech" will be significantly chilled as a result of the ruling is probably itself marginal. We cannot, of course, undertake an economic analysis to determine the probability that the volume of cigarette advertising over radio and television will decline. We can say with fair certainty, however, that the cigarette manufacturers' interest in selling their product guarantees a continued resourceful effort to reach the public. We not also that cigarette advertising accounts for a sizable portion of broadcasting revenues,[63] and we think it at best doubtful that many stations will refuse to carry cigarette commercials in order to avoid the obligations imposed by the ruling.[64]

(4) Even if some valued speech is inhibited by the ruling, the First Amendment gain is greater than the loss. A primary First Amendment policy has been to foster the widest possible debate and dissemination of information on matters of public importance.[65] That policy has been pursued by a general hostility toward any deterrents to free expression. The difficulty with this negative approach is that not all free speakers have equally loud voices, and success in the marketplace of ideas may go to the advocate who can shout loudest or most often. Debate is not primarily an end in itself, and a debate in which only one party has the financial resources and interest to purchase sustained access to the mass communications media is not a fair test of either an argument's truth or its innate popular appeal.

Countervailing power on the opposite sides of many issues of public concern often neutralizes this defect. In many other cases, the courts must act as if such an inherent balancing mechanism were at work in order to avoid either weighing the worth of conflicting views or emasculating the robust debate they seek to promote. If the fairness doctrine cannot withstand First Amendment scrutiny, the reason is that to insure a balanced presentation of controversial issues may be to insure no presentation, or no vigorous presentation, at all.[86] But where, as here, one party to a debate has a financial clout and a compelling economic interest in the presentation of one side unmatched by its opponent, and where the public stake in the argument is no less than life itself—we think the purpose of rugged debate is served, not hindered, by an attempt to redress the balance.[87]

However, in a lengthy concurring opinion, supra note 46, Justice Brennan considered the principal issue to be whether in the Communications Act Congress had occupied the field of regulation of broadcast advertising. Id. at 433 et seq., 83 S. Ct. 1759. There was no dissent. The Court's collective treatment of this case strongly discounts the possibility that it thought such regulation poses serious constitutional problems.

[63] The briefs indicate that radio and television revenues from cigarette advertising total nearly $300,000,000 annually and account for more than 7% of all television advertising revenue.

[64] The Commission has in fact promised to "tailor the requirement that a station which carries cigarette commercials provide a significant amount of time for the other viewpoint, so as not to preclude or curtail presentation by stations of cigarette advertising that they choose to carry." Cigarette Advertising, supra note 8, at 944.

[65] See, e.g., Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 148–150, 87 S. Ct. 1975, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1094 (1967) (opinion of Justice Harlan); New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270, 84 S. Ct. 710, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686, 95 A. L. (5) Finally, not only does the cigarette ruling not repress any information, it serves affirmatively to provide information. We do not doubt that official prescription in detail or in quantity of what the press must say can be as offensive to the principle of a free press as official prohibition. But the cigarette ruling does not dictate specific content and, in view of its special context, it is not a precedent for converting broadcasting into a mouthpiece for government propaganda. And the provision of information is no small part of what the First Amendment is about. A political system which assigns vital decisions to individual free choice assumes a well-informed citizenry. We do not think the principle of free speech stands as a barrier to required broadcasting of facts and information vital to an informed decision to smoke or not to smoke.

IV. OTHER CONTENTIONS

[16–18] The resolution of these basic questions leaves a residue of unanswered contentions. Mr. Banzhaf's complaint that the anti-smokers should have been granted equal time need not detain us. Even if it had authority to specify equal time, the Commission could reasonably find such a specific requirement an unnecessary intrusion upon the licensees' discretion. Likewise, the Commission did not abuse its discretion in refusing to require rebuttal time for the cigarette manufacturers. The public health rationale which supports the principal ruling would hardly justify compelling broadcasters to inform the public that smoking might not be dangerous. And an issue of "fairness" arises principally because the cigarette manufacturers are deterred from making health claims in their advertisements by the FTC's warning that such claims would be "unfair and deceptive."[88] If the FTC's determination is in error, the remedy does not lie in a further particularization of the FCC's fairness doctrine.

[19, 20] Finally, The Tobacco Institute contends that the Commission's ruling is void on account of procedural irregularities. The initial ruling was made without providing interested parties either notice or an opportunity to be heard. But since the Commission subsequently entertained numerous petitions for review, wrote a thorough opinion affirming its ruling, and made the ruling prospective from the date of the affirming order, we find no prejudice to substantial rights. The Tobacco Institute also intimates that the Commission should have held an oral hearing, should have made factual investigations of its own, or should have instituted a full-fledged rulemaking proceeding, before issuing its ruling. As a general rule, we agree that more careful procedures are required to support innovation by an administrative agency. But the essential premises of the instant ruling are only (1) that cigarette advertising inherently promotes cigarette smoking as a desirable habit, (2) that very substantial medical and scientific authority regards this habit as highly dangerous to health and therefore undesirable, and [86] The main thrust of the Seventh Circuit opinion invalidating the FCC's personal attack rules under the First Amendment is that "strict compliance with the rules might result in a blandness and neutrality pervading all broadcasts arguably within the scope of the rules." Radio Television News Directors Ass'n v. United States (FCC), supra note 32, F.2d p. 1014. The rules themselves, the Court said, "reflect an apparent desire on the Commission's part to neutralize (or perhaps to eliminate altogether) the expression of points of view on controversial issues and political candidates. Such a result would be patently inconsistent with protecting the invaluable function served by the broadcast press in influencing public opinion and exposing public ills." Id., p. 1014. Thus, the Court was concerned that both the amount and the vigor of debate might be reduced.

[87] Cf. Radio Television News Directors Ass'n v. United States (FCC), supra notes 32 and 86: "[T]he rules could be sustained only if the Commission demonstrated a significant public interest in the attainment of fairness in broadcasting * * * and that it is unable to attain such fairness by less restrictive and oppressive means." (p. 102 In the instant case, we think that on balance First Amendment interests are advanced by the Commission's ruling. Moreover, the additional public interest at stake is compelling. And the technique of requiring the presentation of opposing views is markedly less "restrictive and oppressive" than many attacks on the cigarette-health problem which might well be within the power of federal agencies, but for the Cigarette Labelling Act.

[88] E.g., FTC, Order Vacating Trade Regulation Rule, 30 Fed. Reg. 9484, 9485 (1965). Industry codes also disapprove of affirmative health claims in cigarette advertising, but in the circumstances we hardly think this self-regulation makes out a sufficient case to require compensatory relief from the FCC.

(3) that in view of the volume of cigarette advertising, existing sources were inadequate to inform the public of the nature and extent of the danger. These premises are supported by the record. We do not see, and The Tobacco Institute has never suggested, what evidence a more extensive proceeding might have produced to refute them.

Affirmed.

WASHINGTON, D.C. 20554

IN THE MATTER OF TELEVISION STATION WCBS–TV, NEW YORK, N.Y., APPLICABILITY OF THE FAIRNESS DOCTRINE TO CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

(RM–1170)

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

(Adopted September 8, 1967)

BY THE COMMISSION: COMMISSIONERS LOEVINGER AND JOHNSON CONCURRING AND ISSUING STATEMENTS; COMMISSIONER WADSWORTH ABSENT.

1. The Commission has before it for consideration: A petition for rulemaking and a petition for stay of effectiveness of application of Fairness Doctrine to cigarette advertising, filed on June 20, 1967, by the law firm of Smith, Pepper, Shack & L'Heureux on behalf of various broadcast clients; a letter, dated June 23, 1967, from Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. (CBS), requesting reconsideration of a ruling in the Commission's letter of June 2, 1967 to television station WCBS–TV; a petition for reconsideration and a petition for immediate stay of effectiveness pending reconsideration by the Commission, filed on July 3, 1967 by the National Association of Broadcasters (NAB); a letter from Association of National Advertisers, Inc., dated June 29, 1967, requesting reconsideration of the ruling; petitions for reconsideration, incorporating requests for stay, filed by The Tobacco Institute, Inc., et al. and WGN Continental Broadcasting Co., et al. on June 30, 1967 and July 3, 1967, respectively; and petitions or requests for reconsideration filed on July 3 and 5, 1967, by American Broadcasting Companies, Inc. (ABC), National Broadcasting Co., Inc. (NBC), Storer Broadcasting Co., Griffin-Leake TV Inc., et al., the law firm of Dow, Lohnes, & Albertson on behalf of 17 broadcast licenses, and the law firm of Pierson, Ball, & Dowd on behalf of the licensees of 61 radio and television stations. A petition for reconsideration was filed on August 1, 1967, by the Maryland/District of Columbia/Delaware Broadcasters' Association; and a statement of position by Federal Communications Bar Association on July 27, 1967.[1] Requests for reconsideration have also been received from several congressional sources. A pleading in support of the Commission's ruling has been filed by the complainant, John F. Banzhaf, III; his pleading challenges the standing of the petitioners and many of the arguments advanced, and urges denial of the relief sought.[2] Petitioners seek rulemaking on, and reconsideration and rescission of, a ruling in the Commission's letter of June 2, 1967, to television station WCBS–TV, New York City, that the Fairness Doctrine is applicable to cigarette advertising (FCC 67–641), and a stay of the effectiveness of the ruling pending action on their petitions.

[1] In addition, the Commission has received various resolutions from State associations of broadcasters and numerous letters from the public.

[2] We do not find the arguments raised as to petitioners' standing persuasive.

2. Our ruling (FCC 67–641) was made on a complaint against station WCBS–TV, New York, by Mr. John F. Banzhaf, III, who asserted that this station, after having aired numerous commercial advertisements for cigarette manufacturers, had not afforded him or some other responsible spokesman an opportunity "to present contrasting views on the issue of the benefits and advisability of smoking." Specifically he noted three cigarette advertisements broadcast on November 24, 1966 over WCBS–TV, which presented smoking as "socially acceptable and desirable, manly, and a necessary part of a rich, full life." Attached to the complaint was a letter by Mr. Banzhaf to the station requesting that free time be made available to "responsible groups" roughly approximate to that spent on the promotion of the "virtues and values of smoking." There was also attached a reply to Mr. Banzhaf by WCBS–TV setting forth the programs which it had broadcast on the effect of smoking on health, taking the position that these programs provided contrasting viewpoints on this issue, and stating its view that the Fairness Doctrine may be inapplicable to commercial announcements solely aimed at selling products. In Mr. Banzhaf's complaint, he asserted that the WCBS–TV showing of compliance with the Fairness Doctrine was insufficient to offset the effects of advertisements broadcast daily for a total of 5–10 minutes each broadcast day.

3. The Commission ruled that the Fairness Doctrine is applicable to cigarette advertisements, but rejected Mr. Banzhaf's claim that the time to be afforded roughly approximate that devoted to cigarette commercials. We held that a station which carries commercials promoting the use of a particular cigarette as attractive and enjoyable is required to provide a significant amount of time to the other side of this controversial issue of public importance—i.e., that however enjoyable, such smoking may be a hazard to the smoker's health. We stated that here, as in other areas under the Fairness Doctrine, the type of programing and the amount and nature of time to be afforded is a matter for the good faith, reasonable judgment of the licensee, upon the facts of his situation; and that accordingly, the initial judgment as to whether sufficient time is being allocated each week in this area by WCBS–TV is one for the licensee.

4. By a letter to the Commission dated June 23, 1967, CBS requests that the contents of its letter be treated as the comments of WCBS–TV on the complaint and that the Commission reconsider its ruling on the basis of these comments. CBS does not request a stay of the effectiveness of the ruling, but does challenge the merits of the ruling.

5. In support of their requests for relief, other petitioners urge that the ruling has broad implications and will affect all licensees carrying cigarette advertising though they did not have an opportunity to be heard prior to its adoption. It is asserted that substantial doubts as to the validity of the ruling are presented by the various requests for reconsideration and other relief, and that licensees will not dare risk noncompliance pending action on these pleadings lest their noncompliance be raised at license renewal time. It is further asserted that licensees would suffer irreparable damage in the interim by temporarily adhering to the ruling because they would risk loss of substantial amounts of advertising revenue and compliance would disrupt station advertising policies as well as give rise to scheduling and production problems. Consequently, petitioners state, fairness and an equitable administration of the Fairness Doctrine call for a suspension of the effectiveness of the ruling, pending action on the petitions for reconsideration and rulemaking.

6. We agree that the ruling constitutes a precedent on an important issue which will affect licensees other than WCBS–TV and may necessitate a change in the operations of some. In view of the widespread interest in the ruling by persons who have not hitherto been heard, and since stay relief has been requested, we have decided to give expeditious consideration to the arguments made in all of the pleadings before us to determine whether anything has been advanced on the merits which would warrant reconsideration of our ruling, a stay of its effectiveness, or rulemaking in this area. The positions of the parties appear to be amply set forth in the pleadings on file, and we have given thorough consideration to the arguments made in reaching our decision. For the reasons set forth below, it is the conclusion of this Commission that nothing has been advanced which would warrant reconsideration or a stay of our ruling or rulemaking. However, in the circumstances, we have decided for reasons of equity that the conduct of licensees (including WCBS–TV), in applying the Fairness Doctrine to cigarette advertising prior to the publication date of this memorandum opinion and order (which we shall also mail to all broadcast licensees), will not be considered in connection with their applications for renewal of license; conduct subsequent to that date will receive consideration, in specific rulings where appropriate or at license renewal time.

I. PETITIONERS' ARGUMENTS ON THE MERITS

7. The principal contentions presented on the merits of the ruling are: (a) That the Fairness Doctrine is itself violative of the first and fifth amendments to the U.S. Constitution and hence cannot properly serve as a basis for delineating licensee responsibilities under the Communications Act; (b) that the Fairness Doctrine, even if constitutional, applies only to programing in the nature of news, commentary on public issues, or editorial opinion, and does not extend to advertising; (c) that the Commission is precluded from applying the Fairness Doctrine to cigarette advertising because Congress has preempted the field and the Commission's ruling is contrary to congressional policy: (d) that even if the Fairness Doctrine properly applies to cigarette advertising, the Commission has invalidly made a blanket ruling that any cigarette advertisement per se presents a controversial issue of public importance, whereas no controversial issue of public importance can be presented where a lawful business is advertising a lawful product and, in the absence of any health claim in the commercial or affirmative discussion of the health issue, there is no view point to oppose; (e) that the requirement that a significant amount of time be allocated each week to cover the viewpoint of the health hazard posed by smoking and the suggestion that a licensee might, inter alia, present a number of public service announcements of the American Cancer Society or the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, will cause a debasement of the Fairness Doctrine generally and substitute Commission fiat for licensee judgment; (f) that the ruling cannot logically be limited to cigarette advertising alone; (g) that the ruling will have an adverse financial effect upon broadcast licensees by causing the cigarette industry to turn to other advertising media and will also have an adverse effect on the sale of cigarettes; and (h) that the ruling is in any event procedurally invalid for failure to accord interested persons on opportunity to be heard prior to the issuance of a novel and unprecedented policy determination. We shall carefully examine each of these contentions below and set forth in full our reasons for concluding that they lack merit.

A. Constitutionality of Fairness Doctrine

8. Those parties claiming that the Fairness Doctrine is violative of the first and fifth amendments to the Constitution incorporate by reference their comments to this effect in docket No. 16574, In the Matter of Amendment of Part 73 of the Rules to Provide Procedures in the Event of a Personal Attack or Where a Station Editorializes as to Political Candidates.[3] By a memorandum opinion and order released on July 10, 1967 in that docket (FCC 67–795), the Commission rejected the contention as to the first amendment. For the reasons and authorities there set forth, we adhere to that determination here.[4] The fifth amendment challenge was also rejected in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, Case No. 19,938 (C.A.D.C., decided June 13, 1967), and we see no valid distinction in the circumstances of this matter.[5]

[3] This contention is made by the NAB, the law firm of Pierson, Ball, & Dowd, and WGN Continental Broadcasting Co., et al. The petition for rulemaking filed by Smith & Pepper states that it does not address itself to the question of whether Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, case No. 19,938 (C.A.D.C., June 13, 1967), is good law.

[4] Since advertising, although not wholly beyond the first amendment, enjoys less protection than other speech (see Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 110–111; Valentine v. Chrestenson, 316 U.S. 52, 54; Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 142, note 1; Beard v. Alexandria, 341 U.S. 622, 641–643), the Commission's power to regulate advertising by radio may, indeed, be broader than it is with respect to programming. See Head v. Board of Examiners, 374 U.S. 424, 430–431, 437–441 (advertising), and cf. Farmers Union v. WDAY, 360 U.S. 525, 529–530 (political broadcasts): Henry v. Federal Communications Commission, 302 F. 2d 191, 194 (C.A.D.C.), certiorari denied, 371 U.S. 821 (entertainment).

[5] Insofar as it is asserted that due process has not been accorded, we believe that our extensive consideration of the pleadings filed since the ruling meets the requirements of due process in view of the nature of the issue and the arguments relating thereto (see pars. 55–58, infra). The conduct of licensees prior to the publication of this memorandum opinion and order will not be considered adversely when the question of renewal of license arises.

B. Scope of Fairness Doctrine

9. In contending that the Fairness Doctrine does not apply to advertising, the parties argue that the doctrine had its genesis in the 1949 Report of the Commission in the Matter of Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 FCC 1246, which was meant to apply only to dissemination of news, commentary on public issues, and editorial opinion because it contains no reference to advertising. It is further urged that no mention of advertising was made in the 1964 Fairness Primer, 29 F.R. 10415, and that the Commission has never interpreted the doctrine as applying to advertising. In addition, it is asserted that Congress, in giving specific approval to the Fairness Doctrine as a basic delineation of a standard of public interest in broadcasting in the 1959 amendment of section 315(a) of the Communications Act, 73 Stat. 557, 47 U.S.C. 315(a), limited the scope of the doctrine to programing of that nature since it did not amend section 317 of the act to incorporate a similar provision. It follows, the parties state, that the present ruling is an unprecedented extension of the Fairness Doctrine which is beyond the Commission's discretion or statutory authority.

10. We do not find these arguments persuasive. The Fairness Doctrine has its foundation in the obligation imposed on licensees by the Communications Act to operate in the public interest (see discussion, infra, par. 64), which includes the "basic policy of the 'standard of fairness'" and the "broad encompassing duty of providing a fair cross section of opinion in the station's coverage of public affairs and matters of public controversy." (H. Rept. No. 1069, 86th Cong., first sess., p. 5; S. Rept. No. 562, 86th Cong., first sess., p. 13; section 315 (a); 1949 Report on Editorializing, 13 FCC 1246, 1248–1249.) That "one of the basic elements of any such operation" (13 FCC at 1248) is a recognition by the licensee of "the right of the public to be informed" (13 FCC at 1249), as to "opposing positions on the public issues of interest and importance in the community" (13 FCC at 1258), when the licensee is presenting programing in the nature of news, commentary on public issue, or editorial opinion, does not mean that the licensee is relieved of his statutory responsibility for advertising broadcast over his facilities or his overall duty to operate in the public interest and to make a fair presentation of controversial issues of public importance in whatever context they may arise. (Section 315 (a) 1949 Report on Editorializing, 13 FCC at 1257–1258.) Moreover, the circumstance that Congress specifically incorporated in the Fairness Doctrine into the 1959 amendment to section 315 to make it "crystal clear" that the programing exemptions from the equal time requirement of that section did not exempt licensees "from objective presentation thereof in public interest" does "not diminish or affect in any way Federal Communications Commission policy or existing law which holds that a licensee's statutory obligation to serve the public interest is to include the broad encompassing duty of providing a fair cross section of opinion in the station's coverage of public affairs and matters of public controversy." (S. Rept. No. 562, 86th Cong., First sess., p. 13; 105 Cong. Rec. 14439.)[6] Most important, the amendment refers to the obligation imposed upon broadcast licensees "* * * under this act to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance" (emphasis supplied).

11. The Commission's present ruling that advertising falls within the public interest responsibilities of a licensee is not a novel or unprecedented policy determination. See concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Brennan in Head v. Board of Examiners, 374 U.S. 424, 437–441. This opinion sets out in detail the administrative and other pertinent history establishing the pattern of Commission regulation in this area. (See par. 13, infra.)

12. The Commission has always directed itself particularly to programing and advertising which bears upon public health and safety. The Federal Radio Commission denied a renewal of license to a station which broadcast a "medical question box" devoted to diagnosing and prescribing treatment of illnesses from symptoms given in letters from listeners, and which received a rebate on each prescription sold. KFKB Broadcasting Association v. Federal Radio Commission, 47 F. 2d 670, 671 (C.A.D.C.). The Radio Commission held, with judicial approval,

[6] Given the background to the 1959 amendments (see Red Lion Broadcasting Company v. Federal Communications Commission, supra), we are unable to see any significance in the fact that Congress did not also amend sec. 317 to incorporate the Fairness Doctrine expressly. In any event, as stated, the absence of a specific reference to the Fairness Doctrine in sec. 317 does not show a lack of Commission authority under the general provisions of the act.

that "the practice of a physician's prescribing treatment for a patient whom he has never seen, and bases his diagnosis upon what symptoms may be recited by the patient in a letter addressed to him, is inimical to the public health and safety, and for that reason is not in the public interest." (Id., at 671–672.) The Communications Commission has similarly condemned advertising of alleged medical prescriptions and quack remedies which were deemed inimical to health, and granted renewal only upon assurances that such broacasting would be discontinued. Farmers and Bankers Life Insurance Co., 2 FCC 455, 457–459. The Commission stated that "[a] broadcast station carrying such programs should be held to a high degree of responsibility, affecting as they may the health and welfare of the listeners, and careful investigation of such products, and of the claims made therefor, should be made before they are advertised over a broadcast station." (2 FCC at 458.) See also WSBC, Inc., 2 FCC 293, 294–296, and Oak Leaves Broadcasting Station, Inc., 2 FCC 298 (both involving advertising of quack medicines by one not licensed to pratice medicine). The Commission has also applied the Fairness Doctrine to products such as Krebiozen and to the health issues involved in Carlton Fredericks program, "Living Should be Fun." (See 33 FCC 101, 107 (1962).)[7]

13. Mr. Justice Brennan, in his concurring opinion in the Head case, 374 U.S. at 439, noted that—

> "* * * As early as 1928, for example, the General Counsel of the Radio Commission held that abuses in network cigarette advertising—while not a sufficient basis for revocation proceedings against an individual licensee—might on renewal militate against the requisite finding of broadcasting in the 'public interest.' "

The opinion also notes (note 15) that—

> "Shortly after the issuance of the General Counsel's opinion, the Chairman of the Federal Radio Commission was asked by Senator Dill during his appearance before the Senate Commerce Committee whether he thought the Commission had sufficient power "through its power of regulation and its determination of public interest to handle objectionable advertising?" The Chairman replied, "I think so, Senator Dill, because we have had little trouble about it, even without direct power. * * *." (Hearings before Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on S. 6, 71st Cong., First sess., pt. 6, p. 230.)

See also Hearings before Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on S. 6, 71st Congress, First and Second sessions, pages 88–89. The particular complaint leading to the General Counsel's opinion charged, inter alia, that "the object of this broadcasting is to transform 20,000,000 adolescent boys and girls into confirmed cigarette addicts by creating a vast child market for cigarettes in the United States," that "10,000,000 boys throughout the country are being viciously and deliberately misled by paid testimonials, secured from professional athletes, football coaches, and others, definitely suggesting the use of cigarettes as an aid to physical prowess," that "the medical opinion of the country is being continuously misrepresented to support the health and medical claims made for cigarettes," that the specific claims made for a particular brand of cigarette advertised on the air are overwhelmingly opposed by established health and medical facts," and that "Such radio activities, the petitioner maintains, are clearly contrary to public interest, public welfare, and public health." (Opinion No. 32, 1928–1929 Opinions of the General Counsel, Federal Radio Commission, 77, at 78 (Apr. 15, 1929).) General Counsel Bethuel M. Webster, Jr., concluded that the "Commission may find, in view of this showing, that public interest, convenience, and necessity will not be served by further renewal of the licenses in question, in which case the matter will be set for hearing pursuant to section 11, and petitioner's prayer for general relief will be granted." (Id., at 82.)

14. In short, we believe that the licensee's statutory obligation to operate in the public interest includes the duty to make a fair presentation of opposing viewpoints on the controversial issue of public importance posed by cigarette advertising (i.e., the desirability of smoking), that this duty extends to cigarette advertising which encourages the public to use a product that is habit forming and, as found by the Congress and governmental reports, may in normal use be hazardous to health, and that the licensee's compliance with this duty may be examined at license renewal time (see 1960 Programming Policy Statement, 20 Pike & Fischer, Radio Regulation 1901, 1912–1913). It is our belief that the public interest standard and Fairness Doctrine embodied this principle from their inception. In any event, even assuming the contrary, we think that the Commission clearly has the statutory authority to make this public interest ruling and to extend the Fairness Doctrine to cigarette advertising at this time. While the agency's position as to what the obligation to operate in the public interest requires for cigarette advertising may have fluctuated over the years since 1929, the exercise of such authority in the present circumstances is plainly reasonable. Considering the 1964 Report of the Surgeon General's Advisory Committee, the establishment of the National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health and the enactment of Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act (Public Law 89-92, 15 U.S.C. 1331 et seq.) in 1965, and the recent Reports to Congress by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare pursuant to that act, it is not an abuse of discretion for the Commission to decide now that a licensee who presents programing and advertising which encourages the public to form this habit potentially hazardous to health has, at the very least, an obligation adequately to inform the public as to the possible hazard..[8] (See infra, pars. 30–32.) Nothing that is presented in the extensive pleadings filed in this matter convinces us that petitioners should prevail on their position to the contrary.

C. Compatibility With the Cigarette Labeling Act

15. Petitioners further urge that Congress in the Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act of 1965 (Public Law 89–92, 15 U.S.C. 1331 et seq.), preempted Federal, Stat, and loca lauthority --appealsmqz2Pact eral, State, and local activity to compel health warnings in cigarette advertising, and that the Commission's ruling is not only inconsistent with that policy but lies also in an area where Congress has withdrawn authority. On the basis of our analysis of the provisions of the Labeling Act and its legislative history, we agree that no Federal or State body could legally adopt regulatory measures which would require either a cessation of cigarette advertising or the inclusion of health warning in the advertisement itself. We nevertheless believe, for the reasons set forth below, that our ruling that broadcast licensees presenting cigarette advertising must otherwise inform the public as to the potential health hazard, is not precluded by the Labeling Act and is entirely consistent with the congressional decision to promote extensive smoking education campaigns.

16. The Cigarette Labeling Act states that:

It is the policy of the Congress, and the purpose of this Act, to establish a comprehensive Federal program to deal with cigarette labeling and advertising with respect to any relationship between smoking and health, whereby—

> "(1) the public may be adequately informed that cigarette smoking may be hazardous to health by inclusion of a warning to that effect on each package of cigarettes; and
> "(2) commerce and the national economy may be (A) protected to the maximum extent consistent with this declared policy and (B) not impeded by diverse, nonuniform, and confusing cigarette labeling and advertising regulations with respect to any relationship between smoking and health.

The act thus requires the labeling of cigarette packages with the statement: "Caution: Cigarette Smoking may be Hazardous to Your Health." The act also does the following: (1) Makes it unlawful for any person to manufacture, import, or package for sale within the United States any cigarettes which do not bear the above mentioned statement on the package. Violation of this requirement is made a misdemeanor subject to a fine of not more than $10,000 (secs. 4, 6); (2) prohibits the requirement of any other cautionary statement on the labeling of cigarettes under laws administered by any Federal, State, or local authority (sec. 5(a)), and prohibits, for 3 years, any requirement by any Federal, State, or local authority that cigarette advertising include a statement relating to smoking and health (sec. 5(b)); (3) states that the Federal Trade

[8] It has long been recognized, of course, that "the Commission's view of what is best in the public interest may change from time to time. Commissions themselves change, underlying philosophies differ, and experience often dictates changes." Pinellas Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 230 F. 2d 204, 206 (C.A.D.C.), certiorari denied, 350 U.S. 1007.

Commission has not authority to require any cautionary statement in any advertisement of cigarettes labeled in conformity with the act, but otherwise neither limits nor expands the authority of the FTC with respect to the dissemination of false or misleading advertisements of cigarettes (sec. 5(c)); (4) permits injunctions to be obtained to restrain violations of the act, and provides an exemption for cigarettes manufactured for export from the United States (secs. 7 and 8); and (5) requires two Federal agencies to transmit reports to Congress before July 1, 1967, and annually thereafter: (a) the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare concerning current information on the health consequences of smoking and recommendations for legislation and (b) the Federal Trade Commission concerning the effectiveness of cigarette advertising, and recommendations for legislation.

16a. Section 5—the portion preempting Federal, State, and local activity to compel health warnings in cigarette labeling and advertising—provides in subsection (b):

> "No statement relating to smoking and health shall be required in the advertising of any cigarette the packages of which are labeled in conformity with the provisions of this Act."

It is clear from the wording of this section that neither the FCC nor the FTC could require cigarette advertisements to contain statements of health warnings. However, this does not mean that the FCC or the FTC cannot regulate in other aspects concerning smoking and health. The section does not read, as petitioners would have it, that no statement by others interested in informing the public of the potential hazard from smoking may be required "because of the advertising of any cigarette"—i.e., not in or adjacent to the advertising but at some other time period, by others or the licensee, because the advertising has presented but one face of this important issue to the public. Moreover, although the Senate debate on the Labeling Act is not wholly clear in this respect,[9] the House debate indicates that the FTC is still free to regulate with respect to misleading or deceptive advertising concerning smoking and health under Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.[10] For example, if an advertisement said that cigarette smoking was not a health hazard, the FTC could act to prevent such advertising. The chairman of the House Commerce Committee explained that the Labeling Act did not purport to change the present authority of the FTC, only to limit that authority with respect to compulsory inclusion of statements concerning smoking and health in cigarette labels and advertising[11] (see sec. 5(c) of the act). The FCC's regulatory authority was not discussed in the committee reports on the proposed legislation or in the legislative debates. Nevertheless, the background and legislative history of the Labeling Act furnish some basis for judging what impact, if any, that act has on the FCC's authority in this field, particularly under the Fairness Doctrine.

Legislative History

17. The pertinent background to the 1965 act is set out in appendix A. We turn here to the relevant legislative history. Prior to 1964, a number of bills had been introduced without enactment by Congress in an effort to compel cigarette manufacturers to acquaint the public in various fashions with the health hazards of smoking. With the Advisory Committee's report as a catalyst, many bills were introduced during the second session of the 88th Congress embodying several approaches to acquaint the public with the hazards of smoking: (1) To require that cigarettes sold in interstate commerce be labeled with a health warning, and/or with a disclosure of nicotine and tar content (H.R. 4168; H.R. 7476; H.R 9693); (2) to confer on the FTC the power and duty to regulate advertising and labeling of cigarettes (HR. 9655; H.R. 9657; H.R 9808; S. 2429); (3) to amend the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act so as to make that act applicable to smoking (H.R. 5973; H.R. 9512); (4) to provide for informational and educational campaigns by HEW to acquaint the public with the health hazards involved in the use of cigarettes and to provide for continued research in this field (H.R. 9668; S. 2430); and (5) to enjoin all Government agencies, etc., from taking any action or pursuing any policy which encourages or promotes the public to buy or use cigarettes (S. 2430).

[10] 111 Cong. Rec. 16541–16544 (1965).

[11] Remarks of Chairman Harris, 111 Cong. Rec. p. 16544 (1965).

18. As a result of the submission of these bills, Chairman Harris conducted hearings from June 23, 1954 through July 1, 1964, before the House Commerce Committee concerning possible action by Congress. The purposes of the hearings were to review the scientific evidence of the causal link between smoking and cancer and, if Federal action was found to be required in the interest of public health, to determine what approach would be most desirable. Chairman Harris commented later that the closing days of that session of Congress had not permitted sufficient time for further hearings and for the preparation and consideration of carefully drawn legislation in this field. These hearings before the House Commerce Committee were the only hearings conducted on the subject of cigarette labeling and advertising by either side of Congress during the second session of the 88th Congress.

19. Legislative activity resumed in the first session of the 89th Congress with consideration of bills taking three basic approaches to the smoking health hazard problem: (1) To amend the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act to regulate smoking products (H.R. 2248); (2) to provide for a health warning and/or nicotine and tar content on the label of cigarette packages (S. 559; H.R. 3014; H.R. 4007; H.R. 7051; H.R. 4244); and (3) to give the FTC the power and duty to regulate advertising and labeling of cigarettes (S. 547). Both the Senate and the House Commerce Committees undertook hearings to determine the state of the medical evidence for and against the causal link between smoking and disease and to determine what Federal action, if any, should be required in the public interest. With regard to these questions, the Senate Committee concluded (S. Rept. No. 195, 89th Cong., First sess., p. 3):

> "While there remain a substantial number of individual physicians and scientists—the Commerce Committee received testimony from 39 of them—who do not believe that it has been demonstrated scientifically that smoking causes lung cancer or other diseases, no prominent medical or scientific body undertaking a systematic review of the evidence has reached conclusions opposed to those of the Surgeon General's Advisory Committee.
> "The Commerce Committee, therefore, concurs in the judgment that 'appropriate remedial action' is warranted."

The House Committee was unwilling to conclude for or against the medical opinions embodied in the Advisory Committee's report or the medical evidence elicited by its own hearings. However, it did conclude that congressional action should be taken with regard to the relationship of smoking and health (H. Rept. No. 449, 89th Cong., first sess., p. 3).

20. As petitioners point out, Congress in enacting the Cigarette Labeling Act was concerned about possible economic impact on the tobacco and broadcasting industries, as well as the potential health hazard to the public. The House Report states (id., at p. 3):

> "The determination of appropriate remedial action in this area, as recommended by the Surgeon General's Advisory Committee, is a responsibility which should be exercised by Congress after considering all the facets of the problem. The problem has broad implications in the field of public health and health research, and involves potentially far-reaching consequences for a number of sectors of our economy. The entire tobacco raising and manufacturing industry, and the numerous businesses which market tobacco products are involved. Some proposals have been made in this area which might lead to severe curtailing or the possible elimination of cigarette advertising. This could have a serious economic impact on the television, radio, and publishing industries in the United States."

21. The compromise evolved by Congress was to require a health warning in labeling, but not in advertising, for an interim period pending a further congressional determination as to whether extensive smoking education campaigns and industry self-discipline would render such a drastic step unnecessary. The Senate Report states (S. Rept. No. 195, 89th Cong., first sess., p. 5):

> "Considering the combined impact of voluntary limitations on advertising under the cigarette advertising code, the extensive smoking education campaigns now underway, and the compulsory warning on the package, which will be required under the provisions of this bill, it was the committee's unanimous judgment that no warning in cigarette advertising should be required pending the showing that these vigorous, but less drastic, steps have not adequately alerted the public to the potential hazard from smoking."

The House Report similarly states that the cigarette advertising code and the educational and informational programs of HEW in combination with the Labeling Act made it unnecessary to insert health warnings in cigarette advertising as proposed by the FTC (H. Rept. No. 449, 89th Cong., first sess., pp. 4, 5). The Labeling Act provides that the provisions which affect the regulation of advertising shall terminate on July 1, 1969 (sec. 10). The reason for specifying this termination date was the expectation of Congress that before that date, on the basis of all available information, including that contained in the reports to be submitted by HEW and FTC, it would reexamine the subject matter of the Labeling Act.

Conclusion

22. In the light of the foregoing, it is our view that section 5 of the Labeling Act was meant to preclude any requirement of a health warning in the advertising itself, as proposed by the FTC rule (see par. 7, app. A), but there was no legislative intent otherwise to foreclose the use of radio, along with other educational media, as an effective means of informing the public to the potential hazard of smoking. The Fairness Doctrine has its reason for being in (1949 Report on Editorializing, 13 FCC at 1249):

> "* * * the paramount right of the public in a free society to be informed and to have presented to it for acceptance or rejection the different attitudes and viewpoints concerning these vital and often controversial issues which are held by the various groups which make up the community. It is this right of the public to be informed, rather than any right on the part of the Government, any broadcast licensee or any individual member of the public to broadcast his own particular views on any matter, which is the foundation stone of the American system of broadcasting." [Footnote omitted.]

We also cannot believe that Congress would have overturned so basic a tenet of communications law and policy in this area or that it would have withdrawn so fundamental a responsibility of the Commission without some express indication and explanation (See par. 30, infra). On the contrary we believe that for reasons developed below, our action is entirely consistent with the "comprehensive Federal program * * *" (sec. 2, Cigarette Labeling Act), since it will promote the "extensive education campaigns," which Congress noted and relied upon in reaching the policy judgment embodied in the act (see par. 21, supra).

23. As stated, our ruling accords with and is tailored to the legislative policy embodied in the Labeling Act. In the first place, the ruling does not require a health warning in or adjacent to cigarette advertising—a matter coming within section 5(b) of the "preemption" portion of the act. Rather it leaves to the good faith, reasonable judgment of the licensee—upon the facts of his situation—the matters of the type of programing, the nature of the time to be afforded for the opposing viewpoint, and the amount of time to be allocated on a regular basis.

24. Second, our ruling does not preclude or curtail presentation by stations of cigarette advertising which they choose to carry (see also, pars. 48–54, infra). We rejected Mr. Banzhaf's claim that the time afforded for the opposing viewpoint should "roughly approximate" that devoted to cigarette advertising, not only because the Fairness Doctrine does not require "equal time" but also in the belief that this would be inconsistent with the congressional direction in this field provided in the Labeling Act. For, we recognized that the "practical result of any roughly one-to-one correlation would probably be either the elimination or substantial curtailment of broadcast cigarette advertising." We stressed that our action would be tailored so as to carry out the congressional purpose, and we shall of course adher to that guideline in implementation of the ruling.

25. Most important, we think that our ruling implements the smoking education campaigns referred to as a basis for congressional action in the Labeling Act (supra, par. 21). Congress itself has affirmatively promoted such educational efforts by appropriating $2 million for use by HEW in this direction. Public Law 89–156, Title II, Public Health Services, Chronic Diseases and Health of the Aged. As a consequence, HEW has established the National Clearinghouse for Smoking and Health. Its purposes are to collect, organize, and disseminate information on smoking and health, to provide encouragement and support for State and local educational activities, and to conduct research into the behavioral nature of the smoking habit. The Public Health Service and others have acted to inform the public on smoking and health directly by sending lecturers across the United States to address local groups, distributing printed information to the public, and furnishing the broadcast media with spot announcements on smoking and health. The Public Health Service reported in January 1967 that it has distributed spot announcements to over 900 radio stations and is at present approaching individual television stations to obtain further coverage for its messages. The American Cancer Society reports that it has received favorable responses from all the networks and many independent stations concerning the promotion of its spots on smoking and health.

26. The Public Health Service has also worked through local organizations to warn the public of the health hazards of smoking. It is in direct contact with a number of regional, State, or local interagency advisory committees on smoking and health, which have worked to stimulate community interest in 35 States. As a result of this stimulus and others, the medical societies of at least 18 States have made statements linking cigarette smoking with lung cancer and other health hazards and, in some cases, have undertaken organized activity to publicize the relationship of smoking and health. For example, the California Medical Association has recently undertaken a program urging individual doctors to acquaint their patients with the health hazards of smoking. Local and statewide civic groups have also started public education efforts.

27. The Public Health Service and the U.S. Children's Bureau have directed a special education campaign aimed at school-age children. To date, school programs on smoking and health reach about 70 percent of the schoolchildren in the United States. Forty States have developed materials on smoking and health for children or plan to do so, and 27 States have either held conferences on smoking and health or intend to do so. In September 1966, a nationwide program to discourage smoking among seventh and eighth graders was launched by the National Congress of Parents and Teachers. This plan is being supported by the Public Health Service and is operating in 21 States.

28. The affected industries have renewed their efforts at self-regulation since the enactment of the Labeling Act. While there has been no change in the Cigarette Advertising Code of the cigarette manufacturers, they have sought and obtained FTC approval to make factual advertising statements about tar and nicotine content. On March 25, 1966, the FTC determined that a factual statement of the tar and nicotine content of the mainstream smoke from a cigarette would not be in violation of that Commission's 1955 cigarette advertising guides or of any provision of the law administered by the Commission. However, no collateral statements (other than the factual statement of tar and nicotine content of cigarettes) suggesting the reduction or elimination of health hazards in smoking are allowed, and all these factual statements must be based upon a standardized testing technique.[12]

29. In October 1966 the code authority for the NAB issued the Cigarette Advertising Guidelines which they had announced during the 1965 Senate hearings would be forthcoming.[13] The main objectives of the guidelines are to restrict advertising appeals to youth and statements concerning the health benefits of smoking. In January 1967, the Code Authority announced in a news release a slight change in the Television Code to strengthen its position as to appeals to youth. The Television Code, sec. IX, General Advertising Standards, par. 7, now reads:

> "The advertising of cigarettes shall not state or imply claims regarding health and shall not be presented in such a manner as to indicate to youth that the use of cigarettes contributes to individual achievement, personal acceptance or is a habit worthy of imitation."

[12] New York Times, Mar. 29, 1966, 53:6.

[13] Text of the "New Cigarette Advertising Guidelines":

Athletic activity.—A person who is or has been a prominent athlete shall not be used in a cigarette commercial. Cigarette commercials shall not depict persons participating in, or appearing to be participants in, sports or athletic activity requiring physical exertion

Tar and nicotine statements.—Factual statements of tar and nicotine content of cigarettes are subject to proper documentation. No statements or claims regarding benefits to health and well-being are acceptable.

Filters.—Cigarette advertising shall not state that because of the presence of the filter or its construction the cigarette is beneficial to the health or well-being of the smoker

Uniformed individuals.—Individuals in certain types of uniforms have a special appeal to youth. Therefore, such uniformed individuals as commercial pilots, firemen, the military and police officers shall not be used in cigarette advertising.

Premiums.—Cigarette advertising shall not include references to offers of premiums which are primarily designed for youth.

Portrayal of youth.—Children or youth shall not appear in cigarette commercials in any manner, even though they are merely bystanders or part of the background. Cigarette advertising shall use individuals who both are and appear to be adults and who are shown in settings associated with adults.

30. Considering these affirmative efforts by Congress, Federal, State, and local public and private agencies, and the affected industries to educate the public as to the smoking health hazard and, particularly, to discourage youth from forming the habit, we are not persuaded by petitioners' argument that HEW and FTC have primary jurisdiction in this matter and that this Commission alone is precluded from following its traditional method of assuring that the public is adequately informed as to both sides of this controversial issue of public importance. Significantly, Congress was at pains to spell out what was preempted (sec. 5 (a) and (b)) and specifically stated that except as is otherwise provided in subsections (a) and (b), "nothing in this Act shall be construed to limit, restrict, expand, or otherwise affect, the authority of the Federal Trade Commission with respect to unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the advertising of cigarettes * * *." Similarly, we believe that there was no preclusion of FCC action, so long as such action is consonant with the "comprehensive Federal program * * *" (sec. 2). As set forth in the prior discussion, we think that our responsibilities and policies under the Communications Act and our ruling herein are entirely consonant with the congressional objectives in this area. Indeed, it is our belief that the Commission could not properly follow any other course in this matter. For this Commission, like other administrative agencies, was "not commissioned to effectuate the policies" of the Communications Act "so single-mindedly that it may wholly ignore other and equally important congressional objectives. Frequently the entire scope of congressional purpose calls for careful accommodation of one statutory scheme to another and it is not too much to demand of an administrative body that it undertake this accommodation without excessive emphasis upon its immediate task." Southern S.S. Co. v. Labor Board, 316 U.S. 31, 47.

31. One further contention of petitioners on this aspect warrants discussion. It is asserted that we are precluded from issuing our ruling because the Commission declined to make any recommendation to Congress in connection with the Labeling Act legislation on the ground that it had not yet studied the matter, and because the Commission still has not conducted any study or proceeding on the smoking hazard issue. The circumstances giving rise to the contention are as follows: Prior to the issuance of the Advisory Committee Report, the Commission stated in a "by direction" letter, concerning possible rulemaking with regard to advertising, promoting or encouraging cigarette smoking among young people, that action would be inappropriate before the Advisory Committee's report was available and (letter to Senator Magnuson, FCC 63-1033):

> "The Commission's concern is limited, of course, to advertising in the broadcast field. Other agencies may have authority to take comprehensive and effective action, if necessary or appropriate. It is, we think, obviously more desirable to treat such an important matter, if possible, on a broad, across-the-board basis rather than in piecemeal fashion."

When the Advisory Committee's Report was issued and the FTC had announced its rulemaking proceeding concerning cigarette labeling and advertising (see app. A), the Commission on January 1964 initiated plans to coordinate its efforts with the comprehensive regulation which the FTC had proposed and with activities of other interested agencies. FCC letter to FTC Chairman Dixon, FCC 64-29 (Jan. 15, 1964). On February 7, 1964, in "by direction" letters to Congressman Leonard Farbstein (FCC 64-100) and his constituent, Mr. Sidney Katz (FCC 64-99), then Chairman Henry answered a request to institute rulemaking proceedings to ban cigarette advertising by reiterating the policy statement quoted above and noting that the Commission would await the results of the FTC rulemaking proceeding before acting in this area. When asked to comment on S. 2429, 88th Congress, and S. 547 and S. 559, 89th Congress, the Commission reiterated its policy that it favored "across-the-board" treatment of the matter of regulating cigarette advertising and that since the FTC had undertaken a comprehensive remedial regulatory plan, the FCC had not held proceedings or undertaken studies to evaluate the various factors and considerations in this area. Comments on S. 2429, 88th Congress, FCC 64-730; Comments on S. 559 and S. 547, FCC 65-96.

32. We do not believe that these facts preclude us, as a matter of law or of policy, from issuing our ruling in the present circumstances. First, as shown above, circumstances have changed. The FTC, while proceeding in other respects consistent with the 1965 act, is not, of course, undertaking its comprehensive regulatory plan to require a health hazard announcement to accompany each cigarette commercial. Second, as also shown above, our ruling is consistent with and particularly suited to promoting the "across-the-board" objective of Congress to treat this matter through extensive campaigns to educate the public as to the hazards of smoking. Third, we did not defer to the FTC as a matter of legal authority but rather of policy. The Commission is not precluded from changing its policies so long as any new policy adopted is, like our ruling, reasonable in the circumstances. See supra, par. 14 and footnote 8. And, finally, studies by this Commission are clearly not required to evaluate the various factors and public interest considerations posed by the issue of smoking and health, particularly since Congress declared and pursued its policy of promoting smoking education campaigns. In this connection, see also the discussion below (pars. 33–34 and 60–62).

33. On July 12, 1967, HEW submitted its report to Congress, which includes the Surgeon General's "Report on Current Information on the Health Consequences of Smoking." Upon the basis of more than 2000 research studies that have been completed and reported in the biomedical literature throughout the world in the intervening 3½ years since the Advisory Committee's report, the Surgeon General states that there is no evidence calling into question the conclusions of the 1964 report and, on the contrary, the research studies published since 1964 have strengthened those conclusions. The Surgeon General summarizes the present state of knowledge of these health consequences, in the judgment of the Public Health Service, as follows (Surgeon General's Report on the Health Consequences of Smoking— 1967, p. 2):

> "1. Cigarette smokers have substantially higher death rates and disability than their nonsmoking counterparts in the population. This means that cigarette smokers tend to die at earlier ages and experience more days of disability than comparable nonsmokers.
> "2. A substantial portion of earlier deaths and excess disability would not have occurred if those affected had never smoked.
> "3. If it were not for cigarette smoking, practically none of the earlier deaths from lung cancer would have occurred; nor a substantial portion of the earlier deaths from chronic bronchopulmonary diseases (commonly diagnosed as chronic bronchitis or pulmonary emphysema or both); nor a portion of the earlier deaths of cardiovascular origin. Excess disability from chronic pulmonary and cardiovascular diseases would also be less.
> "4. Cessation or appreciable reduction of cigarette smoking could delay or avert a substantial portion of deaths which occur from lung cancer, a substantial portion of the earlier deaths and excess disability from chronic bronchopulmonary diseases, and a portion of the earlier deaths and excess disability of cardiovascular origin."

In releasing the report, HEW Secretary John W. Gardner stated (HEW press release for July 13, 1967):

> "The relationship between smoking and health has obvious and serious implications for individuals who now smoke and for young people who may be thinking of starting to smoke. From the standpoint of public policy and social concern, this association constitutes one of the most critical health problems today.
> "It is perfectly obvious that if we are going to reduce the unnecessary death and illness now caused by cigarette smoking, three things must take place: There must be a reduction in the number of people who smoke, a number which now constitutes 42 percent of our population. We must do everything we can to encourage young people not to start smoking: at present, half of our young people are cigarette smokers by the time they are 18. And finally, we must work toward the development of a less hazardous cigarette and, concurrently, help develop a climate of opinion which will encourage acceptance if such a cigarette is developed."

34. The June 30, 1967, report of the FTC to Congress pursuant to the Labeling Act stressed the importance of educating teenagers before they start smoking since the use of cigarettes is so strongly habit forming (Report, p. 8). The FTC report states (p. 13) that whether intentional or fortuitous, teenagers appear to be a prime target for televised cigarette advertising and that the "average American teenager sees more cigarette commercials on network television than does the average American" (p. 25): " '87.9 percent of teenage boys' and '89.5 percent of teenage girls hear radio on the average day' " (p. 13). The report comments (p. 24):

> "In making a decision on whether to start smoking, youngsters especially have a right to know that once they start, they may never be able to stop. A viewer of cigarette commercials and advertisements would never hear of this aspect of smoking."

The concluding paragraph of the FTC report states (p. 29):

> "Cigarette commercials continue to appeal to youth and continue to blot out any consciousness of the health hazards. Cigarette advertisements continue to appear on programs watched and heard repeatedly by million [sic] of teenagers. Today, teenagers are constantly exposed to an endless barrage of subtle messages that cigarette smoking increases popularity, makes one more masculine or attractive to the opposite sex, enhances one's social poise, etc. To allow the American people, and especially teenagers, the opportunity to make an informed and deliberate choice of whether or not to start smoking, they must be freed from constant exposure to such one-sided blandishments and told the whole story."

35. This Commission agrees. Considering all of the foregoing, we believe that our ruling is within our statutory authority and not precluded by the congressional policy embodied in the Labeling Act—that rather it implements that policy. We also think it is imperative in the public interest that we exercise our discretion now without delay for further studies.

D. The Argument as to Blanket Ruling

36. Petitioners further contend that even if the Fairness Doctrine properly applies to cigarette advertising, the Commission has invalidly made a blanket ruling that any cigarette advertisement per se presents a controversial issue of public importance, whereas no controversial issue of public importance can be presented where a lawful business is advertising a lawful product and, in the absence of any health claim in the commercial or affirmative discussion of the health issue, there is no viewpoint to oppose. But this argument misconceives the nature of the controversial issue. Mr. Banzhaf's complaint was that the cigarette commercials over WCBS–TV presented the point of view that smoking is "socially acceptable and desirable, manly, and a necessary part of a rich full life." Our ruling points out that:

> The advertisements in question clearly promote the use of the particular cigarette as attractive and enjoyable. Indeed, they understandably have no other purpose. But we believe that a station which presents such advertisements has the duty of informing its audience of the other side of this controversial issue of public importance—that however enjoyable, such smoking may be a hazard to the smoker's health.

Petitioners point to no example of a cigarette commercial that does not portray the use of the particular cigarette as attractive and enjoyable as well as encourage people to smoke, and we find it difficult to conceive of one.

37. Further, we are unable to accept the argument that in the absence of any express health claim in the commercial or affirmative discussion of the health issue, there is no viewpoint to oppose. The June 30, 1967 FTC report amply documents its conclusion that cigarette commercials today still contain the two principal elements it found to exist in 1964—a portrayal of the desirability of smoking and assurances of the relative safety of smoking (pp. 15–16). The FTC states that desirability is portrayed in terms of the satisfactions engendered by smoking and by associating smoking with attractive people and enjoyable events and experiences, and that by so doing the impression is conveyed that smoking carries relatively little risk (ibid).[14] The report supports this conclusion, more than adequately in our view, by a comprehensive review and analysis of the advertising submitted by a large number of cigarette companies and monitored by the Commission (FTC report, pp. 15–23). Numerous examples are given of the "satisfaction" theme (pp. 15–16)[15]; the "associative" theme (pp. 16–17)[16]; "appeals di-

[14] The FTC report states (p.17) that an estimated 58 percent of the public feel that current cigarette advertising leaves the impression that smoking is a healthy thing to do.

[15] The report states that portrayal of satisfaction, particularly oral satisfaction, continues to be an important element of cigarette advertising. Taste or flavor of cigarettes is most often described in terms of "mildness" (Tareyton filters, Montclair menthols, Camel regulars, Carlton filters, Lucky Strike filters, Pall Mall filters, and Chesterfield kings); "smoothness" (Tareyton filters, Pall Mall kings, Newport menthols, and Lucky Strike menthols); "real", "true", "rich" or "great" tobacco flavor or taste (Raleigh filters, Newport menthols, Viceroy filters, Salem menthols, and Philip Morris filters). Invariably, the taste of menthol cigarettes is either cool, fresh, and/or refreshing ("coolest flavor." Lucky Strike green; "forest-fresh taste * * * cooler tasting," Pall Mall; "as fresh as you like it." Philip Morris; "most refreshing coolness," Kool; "fresher," Newport; "fresh menthol flavor," Camel; "Springtime fresh" and "refreshes your taste," Salem; "a full, fresh taste," Chesterfield). The FTC comments (p. 16): "The impression forms that rected to vanity" (pp. 17–18)[17]; subtle methods of "assuaging anxiety" about any health hazard (pp. 19–21)[18]; the "loyalty" theme (p. 15–16)[19]; and the "bonus" theme, which includes promoting longer cigarettes at popular prices as well as coupon promotions (pp. 22–23).[20] We note also the FTC's comment[21] (Report, p. 18):

> "There is in all the array of positive images an element of escape from actuality. Some cigarette advertising transcends mere image association and projects its own separate and unique world. Examples include 'Salem Country,' a land in which romantic couples romp and preen through shifting sylvan settings; the 'Night People,' whose post evening encounters can lead to smoking Parliament filters; and 'Marlboro Country,' where there daily unfolds the simple male heroic virtues of the 'Old West.' Worry over health has been vanished from these Shangri-las."

38. It comes down, we think, to a simple controversial issue: the cigarette commercials are conveying any number of reasons why it appears desirable to smoke but understandably do not set forth the reasons why it is not desirable to commence or continue smoking. It is the affirmative presentation of smoking as a desirable habit which constitutes the viewpoint others desire to oppose. We see no inequity in the circumstance that cigarette advertisers are precluded by various codes from making affirmative health claims in the advertising programing.[22] The Fairness Doctrine affords an avenue for presenting in regular pro-

'menthol taste' relieves smoking irritation, albeit 'smoking irritation' is never expressly stated."

[16] The report states (p. 16) that associating cigarette smoking with persons, activities, places and things likely to be admired, respected or emulated, i.e., endowing cigarette smoking with a positive associative image, continues unabated in current advertising. For example, outdoor activity of an athletic nature such as sailboating "suggests that the smoking depicted in the foreground, if not conducive to rousingly good health, is certainly not incompatible with it" (FTC Rept. p. 17). In addition, social events abound in which the viewer is brought into the "wholesome, jolly company of cigarette smokers" (ibid.). E.g., "singing aboard the old paddle wheel steamer (with Pall Mall kings); * * * picnicking (with Camel filters); and coffee klatching (with Winston filters)."

[17] The report gives as examples of appeals to vanity (pp. 17–18):

"Be discriminating: 'Particular about taste * * * I'm particular' (Pall Mall kings); 'They like the style of this cigarette' (Parliament filters). Be exclusive: * * * 'exclusive plastic pack' (Philip Morris filters and menthols); 'There's no other cigarette' (Lark filters). * * * 'the smokers who know' (Camel filters). Be a success: 'tastes rich, good, rewarding' (Viceroy filters); 'This man was born rich' (Camel filters). Be a social success: 'Come up to the taste of Kool' (Kool menthols); 'find something better' (Old Gold filters). Be independent: 'break away from the crowd * * * the cigarette for independent people' (Old Gold filters); 'stands out from the crowd' (Salem menthols). Associate with important people: 'Chairmen are never bored with them' (Benson & Hedges filters); the charter boat skipper who has 'got a good ship, a good crew and a good breeze' (Camel regulars)."

[18] The report states that as a result of extensive promotion during 1957–59, the belief appears to be widely held that filter cigarettes are less hazardous to health than regular cigarettes (p. 19). Comparatively overt attempts to allay health anxieties have been made by manufacturers of charcoal filter cigarettes by pictoral details of filters creating the impression that they prevent passage of tars and gaseous effusions (Tareyton, Lucky Strike, Tennyson, Cold Harbor, King Sano, Tempo, Duke, and Lark). Report, p. 20. Other "very low key" advertising enhances the impression of relative safety by adding suitable adjectives to the word "filter": "recessed filters" (Benson & Hedges and Parliaments), "white filters" (Yorks), "menthol filters" (Springs) and "filters with coconut shell charcoal" (Philip Morris). Ibid.

[19] See report (p. 22). Underlying these "loyalty" theme examples is, of course, the promise that the particular cigarette gives great satisfaction (e.g., "Change to Winston and change for good").

[20] The report states (p. 23): "The purchase of Raleigh cigarettes has long been rewarded with coupons redeemable for goods. Today, Belair menthols, Old Gold filters, York filters, Spring menthols, and Domino filters also carry coupons redeemable for goods. Menthol and filter Chesterfields and Philip Morrises carry coupons redeemable for more cigarettes." The report also gives examples of 100-mm. cigarette advertising (Benson & Hedges, Lucky Strike, Winston, and Pall Mall), and states (ibid.): "With a definite relationship having been established between amount of cigarette smoking and incidence of lung cancer and other diseases, a fitting motto for the 100-mm. cigarette campaign might be 'extra health hazard at no extra cost' " (footnotes omitted).

[21] While we have, as petitioners points out, distinguished between explicit and implicit raising of controversial issues in broadcast material where health was not involved (e.g., atheists and agnostics versus the broadcast of religious services), we do not regard those cases as pertinent here in view of the nature of the controversial issue.

[22] We recognize also (as set forth in par. 29 above and app. A) that the tobacco and broadcasting industries have endeavored in their codes to prescribe cigarette advertising standards aimed at reducing the appeal to youth. But the conclusions of the FTC report (par. 37 above) and the statistics and oher matters set forth in pars. 33–34 and 60–61 would seem to indicate that the standards are either not being followed or are not effective in discouraging new teenage smoking. Moreover, it occurs to us that teenagers on the verge of adulthood may be more influenced by a portrayal of the attractiveness and desirability of adult conduct than by one connoting childhood or youthful behavior. Agram time the viewpoint of responsible spokesmen for the cigarette advertisers in rebuttal to any health hazard claims made in opposition to cigarette commercials. And, finally, we fail to see any merit in the argument that no controversial issue of public importance can be presented where a lawful business is advertising a lawful product.[23] While an unlawful business advertising an unlawful product over the air waves might well raise some controversial issue of public importance, we do not regard that element as essential. The claim that no controversial issue of public importance is presented by cigarette advertising is neither realistic nor persuasive.

E. The Contention as to a Substitution of "Commission Fit" for Licensee Judgment

39. Petitioners also argue that the ruling, by requiring that a significant amount of time be allocated each week to cover the viewpoint of the health hazard posed by cigarette smoking and by suggesting that a licensee might, among other things, present a number of public service announcements of the American Cancer Society or HEW, will cause a debasement of the Fairness Doctrine generally and a substitution of Commission fiat for licensee judgment. CBS in particular, noting that commercials are by nature repetitive and continuous, urges that treating all cigarette commercials as presentations of one side of a controversial issue will raise a question as to whether any one program or program series—however enlightening and informative as to all points of view—can constitute an adequate opportunity for response. Asserting that inevitably the licensee's only recourse will be a series of health hazard spot announcements, CBS states that broadcast treatment of cigarette health issues should not be reduced to a contest of opposing spot announcements, endlessly repeated long after any member of the public has understood and acted if he wished. It further asserts that such an approach makes no sense in the area of news and public affairs programming and that the net result of our ruling will be to convert licensee responsibility in such areas to presentations very similar to product advertising.

40. Like CBS, we recognize that the presentation of one side of a controversial issue of public importance in advertising programing poses a situation which differs from that usually pertaining to the presentation of controversial issues in news and public affairs programing. In the latter instance, the issue may arise only once, or a few times, or several times in a relatively short time period because of factors such as timeliness. But as CBS points out, commercials are by nature "repetitive and continuous;" the complaint here went to advertisements broadcast daily for a total of 5–10 minutes each broadcast day. We think that the frequency of the presentation of one side of the controversy is a factor appropriately to be considered in our administration of the Fairness Doctrine under the act's basic policy of the "standard of fairness" (supra, par. 10). For, while the Fairness Doctrine does not contemplate "equal time", if the presentation of one side of the issue is on a regular continual basis, fairness and the right of the public adequately to be informed compels the conclusion that there must be some regularity in the presentation of the other side of the issue. This consideration is not limited to advertising. For example, if one side of a controversial issue of public importance were regularly presented in a daily network program, compliance with the Fairness Doctrine would require something more than an occasional presentation of the other side of the issue during the course of the year.

41. Moreover, here the controversial issue posed is one of health hazard and the repeated and continuous broadcasts of the advertisement may be a contributing factor to the adoption of a habit which may lead to untimely death. In the circumstances, we think that the licensee is under a higher duty the FTC report notes (p. 8): "They tend to view cigarette smoking as a visible mark of maturity, a passport to adulthood. Because the health dangers of cigarette smoking are not brought home to them in an effective and meaningful way, many teenagers take up the smoking habit."

[23] NBC, in urging that licensees could reasonably and in good faith conclude that no controversial issue of public importance is presented by cigarette advertising, notes that the FTC advertising guides permit presentation of enjoyment since they state:

"Nothing contained in these guides is intended to prohibit the use of any representation, claim, or illustration relating solely to taste, flavor, aroma, or enjoyment."

Our ruling is consistent. It, too, does not in any way prohibit the presentation of enjoyment in cigarette commercials. It merely requires the licensee adequately to inform the public of the potential hazard, as found by Congress and Government reports, entailed in commencing or continuing this habit.

than in the case of other controversial issues to ameliorate the possible harmful effect of the broadcasts by sufficiently informing the public as to the hazard. As indicated in our ruling, and in light of the considerations set forth in paragraphs 33–34 and 60–61, we believe that the frequency of the presentation of the one side and the nature of the potential hazard to the public here necessitates presentation of the opposing viewpoint on a regula basis (e.g., each week).

42. We note that, contrary to CBS' position, the repetition of short communications has apparently been regarded by the broadcasting and advertising industries and other interested organizations as an effective means of reaching the listener or viewer. But in any event, there is nothing in our ruling which compels a licensee to treat the issue through presentation of spot messages. In our ruling we have stated: "A station might, for example, reasonably determine that the above noted responsibility would be discharged by presenting each week, in addition to appropriate news reports or other programing dealing with the subject, a number of the public service announcements of the Cancer Society or HEW in this field." This example does not on its face indicate that the opposing viewpoint should be presented solely or principally through spot announcements, and it was not intended as a "Commission fiat" as to the manner of compliance with the Fairness Doctrine.[24] We stressed in the ruling, and here strongly emphasize again, that "in this, as in other areas under the fairness doctrine, the type of programing and the amount and nature of time to be afforded is a matter for the good faith, reasonable judgment of the licensee, upon the particular facts of his situation." (See Cullman Broadcasting Co., FCC 63–849 (Sept. 18, 1963).)

43. In other words, we agree with CBS that the "question of whether a licensee is responsibly complying with the fairness doctrine cannot be resolved by per se guidelines, ratios or other rigid rules." A licensee which has just presented a very lengthy program on this issue obviously might reach a different judgment as to what his obligation was in this respect for the next week or so. But as stated, the carriage of the normally substantial amount of weekly commercials raises a concomitant responsibility to be met over relatively the same period of time. Further, in these circumstances, while a 1-to-1 ratio is ruled out by considerations of the legislative history of the Cigarette Labeling Act, the licensee's obligation is just as clearly not met by an occasional program a few times a year or by some appropriate announcements once or twice a week. We stress again that what is called for is the allocation of a significant amount of time each week, absent unusual circumstances, to the presentation of the opposing viewpoint in the case of cigarette commercials. We do not see why licensees, proceeding in good faith, should experience any real difficulty in reasonably discharging that responsibility nor why, in view of the nature of the issue—the public's health, they would seek to fulfill that obligation in a niggardly fashion, designed to raise problems or complaints. In sum, we have usurped licensee judgment as to the type of programing or the amount or nature of the time to be afforded, but rather have left these matters to the good faith and reasonable judgment of the license based on his evaluation of the facts of his particular case.[25]

F. Effect of the Ruling on the Advertising of Products Other Than Cigarettes

44. Petitioners further assert that the ruling cannot logically be limited to cigarette advertising alone, and hence will have broadscale effect on broadcast

[24] As set forth in par. 25, prior to our ruling the American Cancer Society received favorable responses from all the networks and many independent stations concerning the promotion of its spots on smoking and health. Moreover, the Public Health Service reported in January 1967 that it had distributed spot announcements to over 900 radio stations and was then approaching individual television stations to obtain further coverage for its messages. The example we gave merely took cognizance of the fact that such material is available to licensees if, in their judgment, its use would facilitate compliance with their obligations under the Fairness Doctrine. We thought it desirable to note its availability, particularly for the small station with limited resources, which might have difficulty in preparing its own program material dealing with this issue.

[25] It is also argued that the licensees may simply substitute cigarette health messages for other public service announcements now being carried. The duty of a station carrying cigarette commercials to inform the public as to the hazards of smoking stems directly from the fact that its facilities have been used to promote the use of this product found by the Congress and Governmental reports to be so potentially hazardous to health; its responsibility is therefore the same as in the case of any other fairness situation. It thus has a duty to present the other side, over and beyond what a licensee decides in other respects to present in order to serve the best interests of his area. We therefore do not believe that a licensee would or should adopt a pattern of operation which he does not adjudge to serve fully the needs and interests of his public.

operations and the presentation of advertising by radio generally. They state that very little in society is uncontroversial and, since many products are subject to one form of controversy or other, an appeal to the Commission by a vocal minority is all that is needed to classify a subject as controversial and of public importance. They further claim that if governmental and private reports on the possible hazard of a product are a sufficient basis for the cigarette ruling, the ruling would apply to a host of other products, such as: automobiles, food with high cholesterol count, alcoholic beverages, fluoride in toothpaste, pesticide residue in food, aspirin, detergents, candy, gum, soft drinks, girdles, and even common table salt. We do not find this "parade of horribles" argument impressive.

45. We stressed in our ruling that it was "limited to this product—cigarettes," stating further in this connection:

> "Governmental and private reports (e.g., the 1964 Report of the Surgeon General's Committee) and congressional action (e.g., the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act of 1965), assert that the normal use of this product can be a hazard to the health of millions of persons. The advertisements in question clearly promote the use of a particular product as attractive and enjoyable. Indeed, they understandably have no other purpose. We believe that a station which presents such advertisements has the duty of informing its audience of the other side of this controversial issue of public importance—that however enjoyable, such smoking may be a hazard to the smoker's health."

Our ruling does not state, and was in no way meant to imply, that any appeal to the Commission by a vocal minority will suffice to classify advertising of a product as controversial and of public importance. Rather, the key factors here were twofold: (1) Governmental and private reports and congressional action with respect to cigarettes, and (2) their assertion in common that "normal use of this product can be a hazard to the health of millions of persons."

46. The products to which petitioners refer do not present a comparable situation. The example most uniformly cited is auto safety. But the governmental and private reports on this matter do not urge the public to refrain from normal use of automobiles in the interest of public safety; rather, the emphasis is on increased safety features in the manufacture of automobiles and increased care by drivers. Moreover, we know of no widespread contention by governmental or private authorities that the normal use of any of the other products cited by petitioners poses a serious health hazard to millions of persons who otherwise enjoy good health.

47. We adhere to our view that cigarette advertising presents a unique situation. As to whether there are other comparable products whose normal use has been found by congressional and other Government action to pose such a serious threat to general public health that advertising promoting such use would raise a substantial controversial issue of public importance, bringing into play the Fairness Doctrine, we can only state that we do not now know of such an advertised product, and that we do not find such circumstances present in petitioners' contentions about the advertised products upon which they rely. Thus, to say the least, instances of extension of the ruling to other products upon consideration of future complaints would be rare, if indeed they ever occurred. In short, our ruling applies only to cigarette advertising, and imposes no Fairness Doctrine obligation upon petitioners with respect to other product advertising.

G. Claims as to Adverse Financial Impact Upon the Broadcasting and Tobacco Industries

48. Petitioners further assert that the ruling will seriously undermine the commercial structure of broadcasting, cause a substantial reduction in or the elimination of cigarette advertising to the severe detriment of these stations and their ability to serve the public interest, require a major change in the operation of broadcast stations by necessitating the acquisition and presentation of new program material and the keeping of additional records to document compliance with the Fairness Doctrine, limit the ability of cigarette manufacturers and advertisers to obtain advertising time on broadcast media, and adversely affect the sale of cigarettes, all of which will impose an unlawful burden on interstate commerce and conflict with the congressional intent underlying the Cigarette Labeling Act.

49. The Contention that our ruling will seriously undermine the commercial structure of broadcasting is pressed principally by the Association of National Advertisers, Inc., an association composed of leading manufacturers and service concerns that use advertising, seven of whom market cigarettes. Their concern appears to rest principally on the fear that the ruling will be extended to many other products which are subject to controversy in one form or another. However, as set forth in the proceeding section of this opinion (supra. pars. 44–47), we believe that this fear is groundless. The only real question here is the impact of our ruling on cigarette advertising on broadcast media and sale of cigarettes.

50. We have no reason to think, and petitioners have proffered nothing concrete in support of their claim, that the ruling will cause any substantial reduction in or the elimination of cigarette advertising on broadcast media or adversely affect the ability of broadcast licensees to serve the public interest. As we have stated, we shall tailor the requirement that a station which carries cigarette commercials provide a significant amount of time for the other viewpoint, so as not to preclude or curtail presentation by stations of cigarette advertising that they choose to carry.

51. Nor do we think it realistic to assume that the requirement will cause cigarette advertisers and manufacturers to turn to other advertising media. The attractiveness of the broadcast media, particularly television, as a means of effectively reaching the vast majority of the American public with advertising, as well as other, messages is without equal.[26] We find it difficult to believe that cigarette manufacturers and advertisers would abandon or make substantially less use of a medium of this nature merely because our ruling may require an increase in the programing on the smoking-health issue which broadcast licensees are already presenting in the exercise of their judgment under the Fairness Doctrine and pursuant to their obligation to operate in the public interest.[27] Rather, particularly in light of the consideration set forth above (par. 50), we are not persuaded that the effect of our ruling on the amount of cigarette advertising presented on broadcast media will be significant.[28]

52. We also fail to see how the ruling would require any major change in the operation of broadcast stations. In complying generally with the Fairness Doctrine in their overall broadcast operations, broadcast licensees are required to afford reasonable opportunity for the presentation of the other side of controversial issues of public importance when they choose to present one side, and to document their efforts upon complaint. Our rules require the keeping of program logs (see, e.g., §§ 73.111 and 73.112; see also sec. 303(j) of the Communications Act), and we are sure that licensees in the conduct of their business affairs presently keep full accounts as the advertising matters. Thus, we think that this particular controversial issue can be handled by licensees in a manner similar to their established practices in this area.[29]

53. There is nothing in our ruling which would preclude or curtail the ability of cigarette manufacturers to obtain advertising time on broadcast media. Licensees remain free to present such cigarette advertising as they choose. Conceivably, some licensees, in view of the mounting public concern as to the potential health hazard of cigarette smoking, might voluntarily decide to curtail or refrain from cigarette advertising broadcasts in the public interest. But that is appropriately a matter for licensee judgment as to how to conduct broadcast operations to serve the public interest, and not a requirement of our ruling. Under section 3(h) of the Communications Act, broadcasters are not common carriers and they cannot be compelled to present advertising which they do not wish to present. Moreover, cigarette manufacturers clearly have no right to insist that a broadcast licensee, who is willing to present cigarette advertising, present it in a manner that does not comport with his statutory obligation to operate in the

[26] The FTC report states (p. 10) that more of the money spent for cigarette advertising in the year 1966 was spent on television advertising than on all other media combined (66.6 percent in 1966). The report also states (ibid.) that "in 1966, cigarette advertising accounted for approximately 7.2 percent of total television advertising expenditures."

[27] In this connection, we note that many stations and the television networks (e.g. CBS's efforts as detailed in this case) have given coverage to the smoking-health issue and that they also continue to air numerous cigarette commercials.

[28] Certainly, there is no reason to anticipate that any such minimal impact could have any substantial adverse effect upon the ability of broadcast stations to serve the public interest. Cf., also FTC report of June 30, 1967, at p. 10.

[29] We note that WCBS–TV apparently had no difficulty in ascertaining what programs that station had broadcast on this issue in response to Mr. Banzhaf's complaint.

public interest. Nor does a cigarette manufacturer have any legal right to complain that the use of radio to inform the public as to the potential health hazard of cigarette smoking may lead to some decline in cigarette sales or slow down the present trend of rising cigarette sales (FTC Report, pp. 4–7). Indeed, that is the very purpose of the educational efforts which Congress has directed HEW to undertake.

54. In sum, we see no merit to the contention that our ruling will lead to severe curtailment or possible elimination of cigarette advertising, or have a serious economic impact on the broadcasting industry, contrary to the intent of Congress in the Labeling Act. The ruling properly effectuates the responsibilities of broadcast licensees and this Commission under the Communications Act. There is no unlawful burden on interstate commerce nor conflict with congressional intent in, or the provisions of, the Labeling Act.

H. The Procedural Contention

55. Finally, petitioners urge that the ruling is procedurally invalid because it effects an important and unprecedented change of policy which will affect all licensees and it was adopted without affording WCBS–TV, broadcast licensees generally and other interested persons an opportunity to be heard. CBS, in particular, asserts that this was a departure from the Commission's procedure of advising a licensee of a fairness complaint and requesting its comments (Fairness Primer, FCC public notice of July 1, 1964, 29 F.R. 10415, 10416, cited with approval in the Red Lion case, supra, par. 8.) CBS requests that the contents of its letter be treated as its comments on Mr. Banzhaf's complaint, and that we reconsider the ruling on the basis of such comments.[30]

56. We have granted this request of CBS and have carefully considered its comments in determining that reconsideration is not warranted by the arguments contained in its letter. Our omission to seek the comments of WCBS–TV initially was occasioned by our view that Mr. Banzhaf's complaint, which enclosed his request to WCBS–TV and the reply of that station, adequately set forth the facts of the case and the positions of the parties. Since WCBS–TV has a continuing policy of presenting the smoking-health hazard controversy and asserted only its position that the Fairness Doctrine does not apply to advertising, our letter of June 2, 1967, to that station had two purposes: One, to appraise WCBS–TV of the Commission's view that the Fairness Doctrine does apply to cigarette advertising, as a matter of law and policy, and second, to bring to the station's attention our view that a sufficient amount of time must be allocated, usually each week, for the opposing viewpoint so that WCBS–TV could appropriately exercise its licensee judgment in connection with its continuing program. As stated in paragraph 6, supra, the effectiveness of the June 2d ruling will not be the basis for action against any licensee, including WCBS–TV, until publication of this memorandum opinion and order in the Federal Register. In the circumstances, and particularly the fact that we have fully considered the comments submitted by CBS on reconsideration, we conclude that WCBS–TV has not been prejudiced by the procedures followed in this matter.

57. It is true that other interested persons were not accorded an opportunity to be heard prior to the ruling. It is not the Commission's normal procedure or usual practice to accord the public in general an opportunity to be heard with respect to fairness complaints against a particular licensee, even though the complaint may involve an important issue of policy (see, e.g., Cullman Broadcasting Company, FCC 63–849; Times Mirror Broadcasting Co., 24 R.R. 404 and 407 (1962)). We thus followed long established procedures in this respect. In any event, we have now heard at length from the three television networks, numerous individual broadcast licensees, the NAB, and representatives of the advertising and tobacco industries. We have given extensive consideration to the arguments raised in support of their positions, and have found them without merit. Moreover, the ruling is not effective as to any broadcast licensee until publication of this opinion in the Federal Register. In the circumstances, we conclude that petitioners have been adequately heard and have suffered no prejudice.

---

[30] NBC notes that the Commission did not have before it the text of the three commercials Mr. Banzhaf referred to as examples. It has attached to its comments the texts of three advertisements and states that two of them appear to be those mentioned in the complaint and the third is probably the other. NBC further states: "They may show 'attractive' people 'enjoying' themselves while smoking cigarettes, but surely that does not constitute the expression of a viewpoint on whether smoking is a hazard to the smoker's health." For the reasons stated in par. 38 above, we do not think that the text of the particular advertisements was necessary to our ruling or to our decision on the requests for reconsideration.

58. Further, we are unable to conclude that any useful purpose would be served by affording petitioners a further opportunity for written comment or oral argument. The viewpoints of petitioners on the legal and policy issues are fully and amply set forth in the pleadings already filed, and nothing has been presented which would indicate the need or desirability of further study or proceedings; thus we are not persuaded that any public purpose would be served by initiating rulemaking in this area, as requested by the law firm of Smith, Pepper, Shack, & L'Heureux. We note that the petition for rulemaking does not propose the adoption of any rules, but only the provision of a forum for consideration of the legal and policy arguments urged by petitioners and discussed herein. We do not think that a rulemaking proceeding is either needed or appropriate for their resolution.[31]

59. And, finally, we point out that we could not in any event conclude that stay relief would be warranted pending any such further proceedings. This is not only because we believe that petitioners have not shown any substantial likelihood of ultimately prevailing on the merits of their position, either before this Commission or the courts, but also because the public interest would require denial of such relief on injury grounds. We have already set forth the basis for our belief that compliance with the ruling will not cause any substantial adverse impact on the broadcasting or advertising industries. We have not been shown that any irreparable injury will flow to petitioners. In any event, in view of the strong public interest in adequately informing the public, and particularly teenagers, as to the health hazard involved in the cigarette habit which broadcast facilities are encouraging them to adopt and continue, we think that any injury to the affected industries is outweighed by the danger of irreparable injury to the public. Indeed, if our ruling will contribute to the avoidance of one untimely death, the public interest would not be served by any delay in its effectiveness.

60. In connection with this latter point, we have taken into account the further studies which have been undertaken since the Advisory Committee Report by persons competent in this field. Most important, of course, is the recent HEW Report of July 12, 1967 (already discussed in par. 33 and since confirmed and amplified in its report of August, 1967). We shall therefore note here other pertinent studies. In February 1966, Dr. E. Cuyler Hammond's study for the National Cancer Institute made the first large-scale survey of women cigarette smokers. His study showed that such women's death rate from heart disease and lung cancer were twice that of nonsmokers.[32] In May 1966, Dr. Green of Harvard University reported experiments with rabbits proving cigarette smoking can cause many lung and throat ailments.[33] Roswell Memorial Institute announced in August 1966 a report finding filter tips of several cigarette brands ineffective in screening out harmful tars and nicotine. This report acknowledged that some filters were better than others, but asserts that none protects smokers.[34] A study by the Public Health Service and the American Cancer Society reported in October 1966 that a 5-year study of Seventh Day Adventists in California, comparing death rates of 11,071 male Adventists who do not smoke and the general male California population, showed one-sixth as many lung cancer deaths and one-third as many deaths from all respiratory diseases among Adventists as among the total male population.[35] Also in October 1966, a Louisiana State University 5-year study, financed partly by the Tobacco Research Council, reported findings of a relationship between cigarette smoking and hardening of the arteries in the heart.[36] Just recently, in a formal report to the President, it was stated by Dr. Kenneth M. Endicott, Chief of the National Cancer Institute, that "lung cancer—which will kill more than 50,000 Americans this year—can be brought under control because it is clearly caused by environmental factors—chiefly cigarettes." The President was also advised that "lung cancer has reached epidemic levels in men and may soon do so in women." [37]

[31] As set forth in par. 43 above, we agree with the CBS position that licensee responsibilities under the Fairness Doctrine, in this as in other areas, should not be subject to per se guidelines, ratios, or other rigid rules prescribed by the Commission. Accordingly, we would not undertake rulemaking to prescribe such standards in the absence of some compelling showing leading us to revise our present judgment (see par. 43) and to conclude that rulemaking in this particular area would be appropriate and would serve a useful purpose.

61. As stated in our ruling, of most serious concern to the Commission are statistics as to the correlative rise in cigarette consumption and teenage smoking. In January 1966, the Department of Agriculture in a public report entitled, "Tobacco Situation", announced that 1965 had been a record year for cigarette consumption.[38] The reason given by the Surgeon General for the increase in new smokers, not the increased use of tobacco by the then-current smokers.[39] In July 1966, Surgeon General Stewart reported, based on American Cancer Society and Public Health Service surveys, that one-half of American teenagers are regular smokers by age 18, despite 2½ years of intensive educational efforts.[40] In October 1966, the Rand youth poll, conducted by the Youth Research Institute, released findings that teenagers smoke 10 million cigarettes per week, that 53 percent of all 16–19 year olds are smokers, and that this represents a rise of 4 percent in this age group during the almost 3-year period since the Advisory Committee's Report.[41] In November 1966, the American Cancer Society noted a 6-year study by Dr. E. Cuyler Hammond showing a marked drop in cigarette smoking among older people and a rise in consumption by young people.[42] In December 1966, the Agriculture Department announced that Americans had once again set a new record for total consumption of cigarettes per year.[43] In light of the statistics concerning teenage smoking, this increase in consumption appears correlated to the increase in population which occurs through the increase in consumption appears correlated to the increase in population which occurs through the increase in youthful persons.

62. We wish to make it clear that this Commission is not the proper arbiter of the scientific and medical issue here involved and of course has not sought to resolve that issue. We have cited the reports in question because they establish (i) that here is a most substantial controversial issue of public importance, which must be fairly aired to the American people, and (ii) that because of the seriousness of the issue to the health of the people, a stay is patently inconsistent with the public interest. We recognize that there are countering efforts and arguments put forth particularly by the tobacco industry; there are also new and continuing developments in this field. See hearings before the Consumer Subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee to review progress being made toward development and marketing of a less hazardous cigarette. We have not gone into detail on these matters, because they do not alter the two crucial findings set forth above.

63. As stated, this Commission agrees with the crucial point set forth in the concluding paragraph of the recent FTC report (see par. 34). In view of the congressional action, the Government and private reports, we conclude that a stay of our action would be contrary to the public interest. Licensees must therefore abide by the ruling, or seek judicial review of it (see Red Lion Broadcasting Company v. F.C.C. supra). (Even in the event of such review, the ruling remains effective, absent entry of a court stay.)

II. CONCLUSIONS

64. There is, we believe, some tendency to miss the main point at issue by concentration on labels such as the specifics of the Fairness Doctrine or by conjuring up a parade of "horrible" extensions of the ruling. The ruling is really a simple and practical one, required by the public interest. The licensee, who has a duty "to operate in the public interest" (§ 315(a)), is presenting commercials urging the consumption of a product whose normal use has been found by the Congress and the Government to represent a serious potential hazard to public health. Ordinarily the question presented would be how the carriage of such commercials is consistent with the obligation to operate in the public interest. In view of the legislative history of the Cigarette Labeling Act, that question is one reserved for judgment of the Congress upon the basis of the studies and reports submitted to it (except, of course, for whatever voluntary judgment the broadcasting industry might now make). But there is, we think, no question of the continuing obligation of a licensee who presents such commercials to devote a significant amount of time to informing his listeners of the other side of the matter—that however enjoyable smoking may be, it represents a habit which may cause or contribute to the earlier death of the user. This obligation stems not from any esoteric requirements of a particular doctrine but from the simple fact that the public interest means nothing if it does not include such a responsibility.

65. In light of all the foregoing, we conclude and find:

> "a. The ruling as to the applicability of the Fairness Doctrine to cigarette advertising is within the Commission's legal authority and discretion, and is in the public interest.
> "b. Petitioners have made no showing which warrants reconsideration and withdrawal of the ruling or the institution of rule making in this area.
> "c. Petitioners have made no showing that relief, except as indicated in par. 6 above, is warranted or in the public interest; on the contrary, the grant of stay relief would be likely to cause irreparable harm to the public."

Accordingly, It is ordered, That the petitions and requests for reconsideration, rulemaking, and stay listed in paragraph 1 of this memorandum opinion and order Are denied, except to the extent that relief is granted herein pending publication of this memorandum opinion and order in the Federal Register.

It is further ordered, That copies of this memorandum opinion and order shall be mailed to all broadcast licensees of the Commission.

BEN F. WAPLE, Secretary.

[APPENDIX A]

BACKGROUND TO 1965 CIGARETTE LABELLING ACT

1. On January 11, 1964, the report of the Surgeon General's Advisory Committee concluded that cigarette smoking contributes substantially to mortality from certain specific diseases and to the overall death rate. The Committee recommended that "cigarette smoking is a health hazard of sufficient importance in the United States to warrant appropriate remedial action." After the report was issued, many groups private and public acted to provide this "remedial action."

(a) The Tobacco and Broadcasting Industries

2. Soon after the Advisory Committee's report, the tobacco and broadcasting industries reacted with voluntary measures to control the content of cigarette advertising. In January 1964 the Television Code Review Board and the Television Board of Directors of the NAB recommended and approved specific amendments to the Television Code. The amendments prohibited some types of cigarette advertising directed at young people and health claims in cigarette advertising.[44] In June 1964 similar amendments were approved for the Radio Code.[45] These code amendments were motivated by the Advisory Committee's report. In the words of the Television Code Review Board (Hearings, Senate Commerce Committee on S. 559 and S. 547, 89th Cong., 1st sess., pt. 1, p. 591):

> "The board recognizes the burden of responsibility the report imposes on all television licensees in the area of sigarette advertising. Specifically, the board is concerned with the potential of cigarette advertising to give the false impression that cigarette smoking promotes health or physical well-being.

The code authority also made clear that regulation initiated by the cigarette manufacturers was what they envisaged. Thus the authority provided that it would delay the issuance of general guidelines (interpreting the code amendments) which would assist advertisers and code subscribers in adhering to the television code restrictions, pending its determination of the implementation and effectiveness of the tobacco industry's self-regulation. Id., at p. 592.

[44] Television Code, sec. IV, Program Standards, par. 12: Care should be exercised that cigarette smoking will be depicted in a manner to impress the youth of country as a desirable habit worthy of imitation.

Television Code, sec. IX, General Advertising Standards, par. 7: The advertising cigarettes should not be presented in a manner to convey the impression that cigarette smoking promotes health or is important to personal development of the youth of country.

[45] Radio Code I, Program Standards, sec. H. 13: The use of cigarettes shall not be presented in a manner to impress the youth of our country that it is a desirable habit worthy of imitation in that it contributes to health, individual achievement, or social acceptance.

Radio Code, Advertising Standards, sec. C (g): The advertising of cigarettes shall state or imply claims regarding health and shall not be presented in such a manner as indicate to the youth of our country that the use of cigarettes contributes to individual achievement, personal acceptance, or is a habit worthy of imitation.

3. In April 1964 the major cigarette companies announced their agreement and adherence to a cigarette advertising code to impose standards and enforcement procedures for the self-regulation of cigarette advertising. The code provided advertising standards which would be applied by an independent administrator who would survey the advertising and labeling of cigarettes in the United States, with the power to levy fines for any advertising or labeling which does not conform to the industry code standards. These standards are basically of three types. The first prohibits many types of cigarette advertising specifically directed at persons under 21 years of age. Another prohibits health claims, except in certain limited circumstances. The third type prohibits suggestions that smoking is essential to social prominence, distinction, success, or sexual attraction. Robert B. Meyner, the former Governor of New Jersey, is the first and current administrator for the code. In evaluating the effect of the code on cigarette advertising, Mr. Meyner said in a Senate hearing (id., at p. 568) that the character of cigarette advertising had been altered as a result of his enforcement of the code.[44]

(b) HEW and Private Health Agencies

4. The Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) also took action after the Advisory Committee's report. On February 18, 1964, the Surgeon General, Luther Terry, convened a meeting of four voluntary agencies to discuss with them and other health agencies means of implementing the recommendations contained in the Advisory Committee report. This meeting eventually resulted in the establishment of the National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health on July 9, 1965. The purposes of the Council are threefold: "(1) to use its professional talents to bring to the Nation—particularly the young—an increasing awareness of the health hazards of cigarette smoking, (2) to encourage, support and assist National, State, and local smoking and health programs, and (3) to generate and coordinate public interest and action related to this area of health." The membership of the Council includes 13 private agencies and three Federal Government agencies (U.S. Public Health Service, U.S. Office of Education, and U.S. Children's Bureau).

5. In 1964, the Public Health Service, which strongly endorsed the conclusions of the Advisory Committee's report, awarded 10 grants and contracts to support demonstrations and projects to design effective methods of reaching various population groups with the facts about smoking. The comprehensive educational campaigns, however, which the Public Health Service desired to start had to await appropriations forthcoming from the 89th Congress. The President's Commission of Heart Disease, Cancer, and Stroke recommended an appropriation of $10 million to educate the public on the health hazards of smoking and to provide a network of control clinics to assist those who desire to give up smoking. Two million dollars were forthcoming in the fall of 1965.

(c) The Federal Trade Commission

6. As early as September, 1955 the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) had promulgated Cigarette Advertising Guides which, among other things, prohibited representations in cigarette advertising or labeling which refer to either the presence or absence of any physical effects from cigarette smoking, or which made unsubstantiated claims respecting nicotine, tars or other components of cigarette smoke, or which in any other respect contain implications concerning the health consequences of smoking cigarettes or any advertised brand (FTC Ann. Rept. 1960, p. 82). In 1960 the FTC obtained agreement from leading cigarette manufacturers to eliminate unsubstantiated claims of nicotine and tar content (Ibid.).

7. Shortly after the issuance of the Advisory Committee's report the FTC, on January 18, 1964, initiated a trade regulation rule making proceeding concerning the advertising and labeling of cigarettes. On June 22, 1964, after examining

[44] However, we note the following exchange between Code Administrator Meyner and Senator Bass (id., at p. 581):

"Senator Bass. * * * don't you believe that the industry itself, with you as the administrator, don't you believe that you are capable of protecting the health of the American public as far as advertising of cigarettes is concerned?

"Code Administrator MEYNER. I think you describe a responsibility that is greater than is set forth in the code. As the code sets forth, I am trying to accept that responsibility * * *" the advertising, labeling, and other promotional practices in the cigarette industry, the FTC concluded that cigarette manufacturers should be required to make an affirmative disclosure of the potential hazard from smoking in labeling and advertising (29 F.R. 8325). The basis for its conclusion was twofold. First, the FTC found that the consensus of medical and scientific opinion was that cigarette smoking is a significant cause of certain grave diseases and contributes to the overall death rate. Second, the FTC found that the methods by which cigarettes had been and were being sold to the consuming public—by means of labeling and advertising which fails to disclose the health hazards of cigarette smoking—were deceptive and unfair to consumers under settled legal principles governing truth and fairness in advertising. The rule would have required that each cigarette package bear a warning statement by January 1, 1965. Also, if the warnings on the package together with such voluntary advertising reforms as the industry might have undertaken in the interim, had failed to change the circumstances leading to the FTC's findings, the rule would have then required, in addition, warnings in all cigarette advertising by July 1, 1965.

8. On September 3, 1964, at the request of Chairman Harris of the House Commerce Committee, the FTC extended the effective date of the rule for both packaging and advertising warnings to July 1, 1965 (29 F.R. 15570). Chairman Harris stated that he had requested such action because testimony which he had received during his committee's hearings in June and July 1964, indicated that the validity of the trade regulation rule would be challenged in the courts, that judicial review could delay the enforcement of the labeling requirements for a considerable period of time, and that the enactment of legislation in this area by the Congress could very well eliminate this delay. The FTC rule never went into effect because Congress enacted the Cigarette Labeling Act.

CONCURRING OPINION OF COMMISSIONER LEE LOEVINGER

In the matter of cigarette advertising ruling

I concur with great doubt and reluctance in the Commission ruling that broadcasting licensees presenting cigarette advertising must also present warnings of the health hazards of cigarette smoking. I concur because the result seems to me to be socially and morally right. I have doubts that the action is procedurally and substantively consistent with controlling legal rules. I am reluctant because of concern that this action may represent a subjugation of judgment to sentiment. Briefly these are my views.

Cigarette smoking is a substantial hazard to the health of those who smoke which increases both with the number of cigarettes smoked and with the youthfulness when smoking is started. Cigarette smoking increases both the likelihood of the occurrence and the seriousness of the consequencs of various types of cancer, of cardiovacular failures and of numerous other pathologies of smokers. These conclusions are established by overwhelming scientific evidence, by the findings of Government agencies, and by congressional reports and statute (15 USC sec. 1331 et seq.). The evidence on this subject is not conclusive, but scientific evidence is never conclusive. All scientific conclusions are probabilistic. (See Loevinger, Science and Legal Thinking, 25 Fed. Bar J. 153 (Sprng 1965).) Furthermore, law does not and cannot demand conclusive proof. Even in a capital case, law requires only proof beyond a reasonable doubt. In an ordinary civil case or administrative proceeding a mere preponderance of the evidence is sufficient to carry the day. The evidence as to the dangers of cigarette smoking to the smoker is clearly beyond a mere preponderance and approaches proof beyond a reasonable doubt. This is the basic premise of my position, as well as of the Commission position despite a rather feeble disclaimer that the Commission is not passing judgment on this issue (par. 62).

However, a burning conviction of good to be achieved or harm to be avoided neither establishes jurisdiction in a regulartory agency nor provides a sound legal guide to action. The instant proceeding illustrates the point.

The Commission here was so eager to take its present position that it acted on a complaint against CBS without giving notice to CBS, without affording CBS the opportunity to comment or submit a statement to the Commission directed to the issues under consideration, and without even bothering to secure or examine the text of the advertisements in question. Surprising though it may seem to those unfamiliar with administrative agencies, the Commission was not aware of these irregularities at the time of the initial ruling, and how they occurred is more significant as a study of administrative efficiency than as an issue of due process. It is enough to say that were the issue before us now merely the validity of the original letter to CBS these procedural defects would plainly invalidate the action.

However, what the Commission is doing now is issuing a prospective, legislative-type rule relating to cigarette advertising and broadcastng. CBS has been entirely exonerated from any imputation of unfairness in its broadcasting regarding cigarettes. That ends the proceeding so far as CBS is concerned; so the absence of due process in handling that complaint is no longer significant. In its present action, the Commission is exercising its quasi-legislative authority to make a prospective rule. It is acting on the material that has been submitted to it since the original letter to CBS, so it has before it a variety of differing views from many interested parties. I think it would be preferable to have oral argument on the proposed rule to give the Commission the advantage of the interchange and confrontation between advocates of opposing views, and to permit the exploration of issues by direct questioning. But the refusal to hold such oral argument is not fatal and does not preclude legislative-type action.

Despite the reiterated certainty of the Commission opinion, doubts remain as to the legal authority of the Commission. Repetitious reference to the public interest as establishing whatever conclusion is contended for is no more than question-begging. The "public interest" is a judgment encompassing whatever the person making the judgment deems to be socially desirable. (See dissenting opinion in Regulation of CATV Systems, 6 FCC 2d 309, 330, at 335 et seq. (1967); Loevinger, Regulation and Competition as Alternatives, 11 Antitrust Bulletin 101. 129 et seq. (1966); Schubert, The Public Interest (1960).) The Commission believes, and I concur, that it is socially desirable to discourage rather than encourage, smoking by people, especially young people.

But the Commission has not been given a roving mandate by Congress to do whatever it may regard as socially desirable (i.e., "in the public interest"). On the contrary, it has been established by Congress with a limited jurisdiction and can act only within the power delegated to it by Congress, which means that it cannot act without some definite statutory basis.

The Commission opinion rests the present action on the Fairness Doctrine. This is a rule that broadcast licensees must afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting view on issues of public importance. This principle was first developed on the basis of the statutory licensing power as to broadcasters, Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 FCC 1246 (1949), and was recognized by reference in a 1959 amendment to section 315 (47 USC, sec. 315). The context of both sources refers to "news" and the basic Commission opinion also refers to "commentary" and "discussion of public issues". Neither contains the slightest suggestion that the principle has anything to do with advertising, and that conclusion is most dubious.

Further, I am concerned that extension of the Fairness Doctrine to advertising is likely to lead either to its attenuation to the point of ineffectiveness or its broadening to a scope that is wholly unworkable. No matter what the Commission now says about the distinction between cigarette advertising and other types of advertising, it is establishing the principle that the Fairness Doctrine applies to commercial advertising, as distinguished from paid political broadcasting. The Commission will be hard pressed to find a rational basis for holding that cigarettes differ from all other hazards to life and health. Contrary to the argument in the Commission opinion (par. 46), the normal use of automobiles does pose a health hazard, polluting the atmosphere to a degree that is dangerous not only to those using the automobiles but, even worse, in some localities to everyone, including infants and invalids. The Commission will also find itself embarrassed when, as will surely happen, the cigarette companies demand time from some broadcaster who refuses to carry cigarette advertising but presents public service messages warning against the dangers of cigarette smoking. Having declared this to be a "controversial issue of public importance", the Commission will be bound to require that the viewpoints of those manufacturing and selling cigarettes are afforded access to broadcasting facilities.

The Commission opinion does contain findings that might support the result reached. Paragraph 37 finds that cigarette advertising expressly represents smoking as desirable and implicitly represents that it involves "relative safety" or "relatively little risk." This finding is corroborated by common experience and by scientific investigation. (See Preston, Logic and Illogic in the Advertising Process, 44 Journalism Q. 231 (Summer 1967).) In view of the clear weight of scientific evidence and official findings on this subject, this means that cigarette advertising constitutes both implicit misrepresentation and concealment of a material fact, if the health hazards are not disclosed by the seller. It is elementary law that the supplier of a chattel is bound to disclose its latent dangers to prospective users. (Restatement of the Law, Torts 2d, sec. 388.) There is sound statutory and precedential authority for Commission action to prevent false representations on the broadcasting media (18 USC sec. 1343; KWK Radio, Inc., 34 FCC 1039 (1963), 119 App. D.C. 144, 337 F. 2d 540 (1964), certiorari denied 380 US 910 (1965); Loevinger, The Issues in Program Regulation, 20 FCBA J 3 (1966)).

The normal remedy for such misrepresentation or concealment would be either to forbid the advertising altogether or to require that it carry adequate disclosure of the material facts. There are two reasons precluding such Commission action. First, the Commission has no authority over advertisers as such. Second, the 1965 Cigarette Labeling Act apparently forbids such action.

The first reason is easily surmounted. The Commission has held that a broadcast licensee must take reasonable measures to prevent the use of his licensed facilities for public deception. (KWK Radio, Inc., supra.) The application of this principle to the present situation suggests a means of achieving the result reached here within the limits of statutory authority and without doing violence to the Fairness Doctrine. The second reason is more difficult.

The Commission opinion recognizes the Cigarette Labeling Act as a substantial argument against the present action, since it devotes a large part of the discussion to it (pars. 15–35 and app. A). By reading the terms of the act very literally and the presumed purposes of the act very loosely, the opinion concludes that the present ruling is not precluded by the act but rather implements the policy of the act. The opinion offers a mass of detail in support of this conclusion, but a review of the relevant points casts some doubt. In several messages to Congress prior to passage of legislation on this subject and during consideration of such legislation, the FCC stated that its authority is limited to the broadcasting field and that it believed that cigarette advertising should be regulated on a "broad across-the-board basis" (par. 31). After receiving several such messages from the Commission, Congress in 1965 passed an act expressly stating: "It is the policy of the Congress, and the purpose of this chapter, to establish a comprehensive Federal program to deal with cigarette labeling and advertising with respect to any relationship between smoking and health, * * *" (15 USC sec. 1331). This was clearly the "broad, across-the-board" regulation which the FCC had suggested, and Congress surely was warranted in assuming that the FCC would not undertake to exercise its limited jurisdiction in a "piecemeal" attack upon the problem.

Nevertheless, the Commission opinion argues that FCC action is not precluded for several reasons. The opinion says that conditions have changed because the FTC is not undertaking the comprehensive regulatory plan which it formerly proposed (par. 32). But the reason for this is that the FTC plan was expressly forbidden by statute, and thus the only change in circumstance is the passage of the statute which limits, rather than extends, administrative authority to act in the field. The opinion also concludes that the terms of the Cigarette Labeling Act do not prohibit the present ruling because the act refers only to statements made "in advertising" and not to statements made "because of the advertising" of cigarettes (pars. 16a, 23). However, the act prescribes the form of health warning that is required on cigarette packages and explicity provides that no other statement relating to health and smoking shall be required on cigarette packages or in cigarette advertising. If the act is read as literally as the Commission opinion construes it, then it does not preclude the total prohibition of cigarette advertising, either altogether or in the broadcasting media. The opinion states that this would be inconsistent with the act (par. 15), although there is no specific provision of the act relating to this, any more than there is a specific provision relating to statements to be required "because of" cigarette advertising. The Commission opinion does not explain why the act is construed to permit one remedy but not another for misleading advertising, when neither is explicitly covered. Despite the profusion of detail and the length of the discussion the opinion does not come to grips with the issue posed by the Cigarette Labeling Act. The real reason for the Commission's present action is that during the last several years the Commission has changed its policy—that is, its collective opinion—on this subject and now believes that it should take whatever action it can take to combat the health hazard of smoking, especially by young people who are likely to be influenced by the broadcast media.

It seems to me that the construction of the Cigarette Labeling Act attempted in the Commission opinion is strained and unconvincing. However, the basic difficulty is that Congress was obviously ambivalent on this subject and that there is no unequivocally clear congressional intent to be derived from the act or its history. It was a compromise between conflicting viewpoints which still have spokesmen who are heard in Congress.

I am as persuaded as the Commission majority and its draftsmen that cigarette smoking is hazardous and injurious to the health of smokers and extremely hazardous and injurious to the health of those who start smoking while young. Therefore, I think it desirable that all legal and practical steps be taken to discourage smoking. I have serious doubts that the action taken now by the Commission is legally sound or practically effective. I think that if we spent less effort and space in proclaiming the righteousness of our purposes and objectives and more in careful and rigorous analysis of our procedures and of our legal jurisdiction and authority, and attempted greater specification of the scope and application of our ruling, we would be more convincing and more effective.

Consequently, I am reluctant to concur because this ruling seems to be the result of sentiment rather than conviction. It is based on a strong feeling that the public, especially the younger members of the public, should be protected against enticement to smoke cigarettes, rather than upon a well-reasoned conclusion that this is an effective means of achieving that objective and that this ruling is soundly based on legal authority. My opinion cannot change the result, so all I can do is indicate the difficulties I see in this approach to the subject and the reasons that I have doubts, while confessing candidly that I put doubts aside and join, albeit reluctantly, in voting for the ruling here because of a strong feeling that suggesting cigarette smoking to young people, in the light of present knowledge, is something very close to wickedness.

Concurring Opinion of Commissioner Nicholas Johnson

FAIRNESS AND CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

I join the Commission's decision to apply the Fairness Doctrine to the use of television and radio broadcasting to promote cigarette smoking. In view of Commissioner Loevinger's concurring opinion, however, I believe some brief remarks are appropriate.

With admirable honesty, Commissioner Loevinger has confessed to "doubts and reluctance" about our cigarette ruling. The issues he raises are provocative and significant. They touch on concerns which are, I believe, widely shared by members of the public. They inspire qualms about a case of landmark importance. I consider these doubts unwarranted.

Commissioner Loevinger does not state flatly that he thinks the ruling unlawful. But he does cast grave doubt on its validity, for his dismissal of a number of arguments against the Commission's position displays something less than full enthusiasm. For this reason, I feel obligated to set forth the simple logic behind my support for the decision.

The decision takes as its major premise a factual assertion which is so trivial as to be beyond cavil. Advertising messages are part—an important and substantial part—of the information put before the public by television and radio broadcasting. Roughly one-third of radio's hour is spot commercials. As such, advertising messages should no more be granted automatic immunity from considerations of fairness than any other category of advocacy. If an advertisement takes a position on an issue that is controversial and of public importance then fairness—whether as a matter of section 315, FCC regulations, or common decency—requires that an opportunity be granted to ventilate opposing views (Communications Act of 1934, as amended, 47 U.S.C. § 315(a)(4) (1964); Federal Communications Commission, Public Notice, Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine in the Handling of Controversial Issues of Public Importance, 29 Fed. Reg. 10415 (1964)).

The Commission's minor premise seems equally hard to question. The issue of whether people ought to smoke cigarettes is a controversial issue, and it is one of public importance. It has been recognized as such by Congress, the executive branch, the Federal Trade Commission as well as the FCC, the scientific and educational community, and the mass media. Millions of Americans smoke. Commissioner Loevinger agrees with the by now quite impressive evidence that they thereby incur grave risks of impairing their health and shotening their lives.

Broadcasters licensed by this Commission to serve the public interst devote significant amounts of their prime time to encouraging Americans to incur those risks. Given ths set of circumstances, it is the minimum obligation of this Commission to see to it that a fair opportunity exists to present the other view: the warnings of those responsible citizens who believe cigarette smoking to be a dangerous and insidious habit.

Commissioner Loevinger does not explicitly dispute this line of reasoning. But he cautions against such an interpretation of the Fairness Doctrine by advancing what lawyers call a "slippery slope" argument. If the Commission brands cigarette advertisements controversial issues of public importance, he says, virtually all advertising will be covered by the logic of that decision. No one will know where to draw the line. Now, it is certainly true that it is no easy matter to decide what is and what is not a controversial issue of public importance. But that difficulty is one with which the Commission must live, whenever it confronts a fairness case. The fact that this particular case happens to involve paid commercial announcements does not make it unique in that respect. The slippery slope argument states, in essence, that the logic of this decision, however justified on the facts before us, could be extended to other, more questionable, cases. Of course, this is right. This decision could be extended to other situations. But the fact is that all the hypothetical cases brandished by Commissioner Loevinger are more questionable than this one. By drawing the line at cigarette advertising we have framed a distinction fully as sound and durable as those in thousands of other rules laid down by courts every day since the common law system began.

Finally, Commissioner Loevinger broaches the argument that Congress may have intended to preclude FCC regulation of cigarette advertising when it passed the Cigarette Labeling Act. With all respect, I consider such a sweeping interpretation of that statute (which Commissioner Loevinger himself seems disinclined to accept) altogether misguided. It seems to me to reflect a very limited view of the relationship between particular congressional actions and administrative agencies charged with enforcing established public policies of great significance.

This Commission has few, if any, responsibilities to the people of America greater than its duty to insure that its licensees act consistently with the dictates of the Fairness Doctrine. That doctrine insures that the most powerful medium of mass communication in our society does not stifle competition in the marketplace of ideas. Had the Congress and this Commission not written this doctrine into statutory and regulatory prescription, early in the history of the Communications Act of 1934, the Supreme Court might well have felt obligated to make the requirements of fairness a matter of constitutional law. For fairness plainly deals with issues of constitutional dimension.

In view of the stature of the Fairness Doctrine, we would be underestimating our obligations as members of this Commission if we concluded that the Cigarette Labeling Act tied our hands in the present case. I agree with the Commission that our action here is entirely consistent with the regulatory design created by that act. But even if I shared Commissioner Loevinger's conclusion that the act is ambiguous, it would not alter my view of this issue. Elemental principles of public law dictate that forces within the legislature cannot override a major national policy, unless they persuade a majority of the legislature to inhibit the application of that policy with clarity if not explicitly. In plain political terms, if there was "ambivalence" it means that a majority of Congress did not state an intention to immunize the advocacy of cigarette smoking from the requirements of the Fairness Doctrine. Thus, the Commission's obligation to apply that doctrine according to its inherent logic remains in force.

In conclusion, I would like briefly to express my personal regret at the seeming reluctance of some broadcasters to accept the spirit of the fairness doctrine and this ruling. There is no social force more powerful than broadcasting today. If popular support is to be sustained for industry programing relatively unfettered by governmental restraint—which I encourage—the broadcasters must not only act responsibly but appear to act responsibly. Nothing contributes more to the appearance as well as the reality of responsible broadcasting than the Fairness Doctrine, and the FCC's enforcement of that doctrine. The broadcaster need not withstand alone both the charge that he has been unfair and that he has been unilaterally irresponsible in the self-evaluation of others' charges of his unfairness. He can point to the FCC, its procedures for evaluating such complaints, and its judgments on his behalf. Indeed, if this Fairness Doctrine and procedures did not exist I would think the broadcasters would be the first to urge their creation.

Note that, for a variety of reasons, the FCC has not banned cigarette advertising from broadcasting. Our action today simply requires broadcasters—public licensees charged with operating in the public interest—to afford opportunity for fair response to the appeals of cigarette commercials. It is a mild form of regulation. It will have little, if any, impact on the advertising revenues of station owners and networks. It will increase the amount of public service time for which they may take credit.

Unfortunately, it will probably also do little to brake the still-climbing rate of cigarette consumption by Americans, especially our young people—who see, on the average, at least one television program every day sustained by commercials associating cigarette smoking with adulthood and other goals of youth. FTC Commissioner Elman has estimated that some 300,000 Americans die prematurely each year because of their affection for cigarettes. Given these facts, I should think broadcasters would want to give far more serious consideration than they have to a voluntary ban on the carriage of cigarette advertisements.

For, once again, it is the appearance as well as the reality that moves men's souls. And, unfortunately from the standpoint of the broadcasters' relations with their public, broadcasting's encouragement of cigarette consumption is an issue wrapped in profits as well as propriety (roughly $200 million a year). This is not an insignificant amount of money voluntarily to forgo. But, especially if its loss is ultimately inevitable anyway, it may be far cheaper in the long run to gain the goodwill of voluntary forbearance than to risk forever tainting the good name of American broadcasting.

Dissenting opinion filed by MCGOWAN, Circuit Judge.

WRIGHT, Circuit Judge: In these cases we are asked to decide whether a broadcast license may, as a general policy, refuse to sell any of its advertising time to groups or individuals wishing to speak out on controversial public issues. The Federal Communications Commission concluded that such a policy is permissible.[1] We reverse the Commission's decision. And we remand for further proceedings.

The principle at stake here is one of fundamental importance: it concerns the people's right to engage in and to hear vigorous public debate on the broadcast media. More specifically, it concerns the application of that right to the substantial portion of the broadcast day which is sold for advertising. For too long advertising has been considered a virtual free fire zone, largely ungoverned by regulatory guidelines. As a result, a cloying blandness and commercialism—sometimes said to be characteristic of radio and television as a whole—have found an especially effective outlet. We are convinced that the time has come for the Commission to cease abdicating responsibility over the uses of advertising time. Indeed, we are convinced that broadcast advertising has great potential for enlivening and enriching debate on public issues, rather than drugging it with an overdose of non-ideas and non-issues as is now the case.

Under attack here is an allegedly common practice in the broadcast industry—airing only those paid presentations which advertise products or which deal with "non-controversial" matters, and confining the discussion of controversial public issues to formats such as the news or documentaries which are tightly controlled and edited by the broadcaster. In the Commission's view, an attack on the permissibility of this practice "goes to the heart of the system of broadcasting which has developed in this country."[2] We disagree. The actual issue before us is relatively narrow and we decide it narrowly. We do not have to cut to the "heart" of our system of broadcasting; we leave undisturbed the licensee's basic right to exercise judgment and control in public issue programming and the sale of advertising time. All we do is forbid an extreme form of control which totally excludes controversial public debate from broadcast advertising time.

We hold specifically that a flat ban on paid public issue announcements is in violation of the First Amendment, at least when other sorts of paid announcements are accepted. We do not hold, however, that the planned announcements of the petitioners—or, for that matter, of any other particular applicant for air time—must necessarily be accepted by broadcast licensees. Rather, we confine ourselves to invalidating the flat ban alone, leaving it up to the licensees and the Commission to develop and administer reasonable procedures and regulations determining which and how many "editorial advertisements" will be put on the air.

I

Both petitioners in these cases are organizations whose primary modus operandi is public persuasion and communication. As a rule, they do not attract attention to their views by performing newsworthy acts, such as engaging in civil disobedience or organizing mass demonstrations. They depend, instead, on their ability to get a hearing—as full as possible and as direct as possible—from the general public. Surely radio and television would seem to be the most effective media for their purposes. Yet they contend that their self-expression on those media—and, therefore, the public's access to their views—is significantly inhibited by broadcaster policies barring any and all paid editorial messages from the airwaves.

The Business Executives Move for Vietnam Peace (BEM) is a national organization of over 2,700 business owners and executives, organized in opposition to the war. BEM apparently believes that it is in a position to offer the public a unique viewpoint on what is no doubt one of the great political and moral issues of our time. In order to communicate that viewpoint, it prepared several recorded one-minute radio announcements. The announcements urged "immediate withdrawal of American forces from Vietnam and from other overseas military installations" and featured statements by leading businessmen and retired military officers whose views may carry particular weight with the general public. BEM sought to buy time to air these announcements on the broadcast media, just as commercial advertisers do. It must have seemed an extraordinarily effective means of directly communicating its ideas and sense of urgency to the broad listening audience.

[2] Democratic National Committee, supra Note 1, 25 F.C.C. 2d — 221.

In June 1969 BEM sought to purchase time for its announcements on WTOP, an all-news radio station in the nation's capital. Like most broadcasters, WTOP sells substantial amounts of time for short advertisements. Yet over a period of eight months it repeatedly refused to sell any time to the business executives. WTOP cited no particular objection to the planned announcements. Rather, it relied solely upon an across-the-broad policy barring all editorial advertisements—"its long established policy of refusing to sell spot announcement time to individuals or groups to set forth views on controversial issues."[3] BEM then filed a complaint with the Federal Communications Commission alleging violations of both the fairness doctrine and the First Amendment.

The Democratic National Committee (DNC) came to the Commission with much the same sort of complaint. It stated that it was in the process of planning an extensive media campaign to communicate the Democratic Party's views on crucial issues and to solicit funds. In our political system, it is of obvious importance that the public have access—as direct and full as possible—to the views of the political parties. A party currently out of office may well regard such communication as particularly vital. Yet DNC alleged that it confronted several obstacles to direct self-expression on the broadcast media, among them the refusal of some broadcasters to sell time for comment on controversial public issues. Unlike the business executives, DNC did not complain of any individual refusal to sell time for a particular editorial advertisement. Rather, it cast the issue in a somewhat different light by seeking a declaratory ruling from the Commission that "[a] broadcaster may not, as a general policy, refuse to sell time to responsible entities, such as DNC, for the solicitation of funds and for comment on public issues."

The Commission considered the two cases together and rejected the arguments of both BEM and DNC on the same day. The issues involved did not overlap completely. For example, the Commission found a defect in the vagueness and generality of BEM's fairness doctrine complaint,[4] and it resolved DNC's contention concerning fund solicitation by noting that all three television networks had agreed to accept such solicitations and by stating that any broadcaster policy of confining solicitations to election periods alone "would appear arbitrary."[5] On the matters central to these petitions for review, however, the Commission resolved both cases in the same fashion, and we, therefore, are also considering them as one.

[3] WTOP also stated "that 'subjects of this type require a more in-depth analysis than can be provided in a 10, 20, 30 or 60 second announcement.'" Business Executives Move for Vietnam Peace, supra Note 1, 25 F.C.C.2d at 242. There is no indication, however, that WTOP's "long established policy" of refusing to sell time for any controversial advertisement would have permitted it to sell BEM 5 minutes or 10 minutes for a more "in-depth" treatment of its antiwar views. For a discussion of the permissibility of a flat ban on "short" public issue advertisements, see text at pages 28–29 infra.

[4] In its original complaint, BEM alleged generally that WTOP had failed to cover antiwar views fully and fairly. However, it offered no specific proof whatever of its allegations, and WTOP, on the other hand, offered a lengthy compilation of news and interview shows which aired the opinions of some antiwar groups and individuals. BEM has not pressed its fairness doctrine argument on appeal, but rather has relied solely upon the First Amendment right-of-access contention which it also made before the Commission. Therefore, we need not consider here the Commission's holding that BEM failed to shoulder its full burden of going forward under the fairness doctrine.

[5] All three television networks also commented on the sale of time for editorial advertising. CBS stated it would sell no time for such advertising, although an exception would be made for broadcasts on behalf of political candidates or ballot propositions. ABC said it would not sell time to most groups for public issue advertising since that would inspire a "flood" of requests, but it would "be prepared, consistent with its other obligations, to accept such orders for time from major political parties as can be accommodated on a reasonable basis." And NBC stated it "has no policy which would prevent the purchase of program time envisioned by DNC." We are constrained to note here that any discrimination in the sale of editorial advertising time in favor of political parties alone or the "major" political parties—and totally excluding other more issue-oriented groups or "minor" political parties—would be highly suspect under the First Amendment. See text at pages 33–35 infra.

The Commission held that it is permissible for a broadcast licensee to follow a general policy of rejecting all editorial advertisements. The essence of its reasoning in the two cases was as follows: First, it interpreted the fairness doctrine to allow rejection of paid controversial announcements. The doctrine, evolved by the Commission and endorsed generally in the Communications Act, demands that all controversial issues of public importance be covered both fully and fairly by broadcasters. Yet the Commission held that it leaves the licensees broad leeway to exercise their professional judgment as to "the format for presentation of controversial issues 'and all others facets of such programming'." Editorial advertising, the Commission said, is simply one of several possible formats for coverage of public issues. Under the permissive "reasonableness" standard of the fairness doctrine, acceptance of that particular format is by no means compulsory.

Second, the Commission interpreted the First Amendment to be equally permissive. Its reasoning on this point was rather sparse. It made no effort, for example, to identify the peculiar First Amendment interests attaching to paid editorial announcements as opposed to coverage of controversial issues on news, interview or discussion programs. Instead, it was content to raise the spectre of the "chaos" and other practical difficulties that, it said, would attend a right of access to the broadcast media. The Commission concluded that the fairness doctrine's requirement of full and fair coverage—tolerant as it is of a flat ban on the editorial advertisement format of expression—provides as much protection of public debate as the First Amendment demands.

Before this court, both petitioners make substantially the same attack on the Commission's decision. They do not ask for a ruling that all editorial advertisements submitted to broadcasters must be accepted. Nor do they seek to foreclose entirely the broadcasters' exercise of reasonable discretion. What they advocate is a limited right of access to radio and television for paid public issue announcements. They atack the Commission's ruling that a total exclusion of such announcements is permissible.

Petitioners have left no stone unturned in their attack on the exclusion of editorial advertising. They have invoked the Communications Act's "public interest" requirement[6] and the statutory-regulatory fairness requirement[7]—as well as First Amendment principles—to support their argument. In other contexts, we might attempt to avoid the constitutional issue by coming to a decision on nonconstitutional grounds. But that course is neither fruitful nor possible here.

Speaking specifically of the Commission, the Supreme Court has stressed the "venerable principle that the construction of a statute by those charged with its execution should be followed unless there are compelling indications that it is wrong." Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., 395 U.S. 367, 381 (1969). Thus the nonconstitutional question here is whether there are "compelling indications" that the public interest and fairness requirements compel some opening for public issue advertisements on radio and television. In matters of allocating burdens, reforming procedures and ensuring full attention to all relevant factors in agency decision making, we have not been reluctant to reverse the Commission in order to vindicate "the public interest."[8] We have also intervened to see that broad policies developed by the Commission under the fairness doctrine are applied fully and consistently to all cases.[9] However, when we are asked to reverse major substantive interpretations of the grand and open-ended statutory requirements, we tread somewhat more difficult terrain. Obviously, the requirements mean something and there must be a great range of actions which they foreclose to the Commission; but, in establishing the necessary guidelines, we must ourselves seek extrinsic guidance.

In these cases, that guidance comes from the Constitution. Petitioners have presented no "compelling" evidence from legislative history to indicate a congressional policy in favor of, or even a real congressional attention to, editorial advertising. Rather, their arguments on the nonconstitutional points closely parallel their constitutional arguments. The general policy considerations which they invoke encompass all of the interests that would have to be evaluated under the relevant First Amendment law. It would make no sense for us to blind ourselves to the constitutional status of those interests and to the doctrine that has been built up around them.

[7] 47 U.S.C. § 315(a) (1964). For a discussion of the regulatory development of the fairness doctrine and its eventual adoption in the Communications Act, see Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., 395, U.S. 367, 375–381 (1969).

[8] See, e.g., Office of Communication of United Church of Christ v. F.C.C., 123 U.S. App. D.C. 112, 425 F2d 543 (1969).

[9] See, e.g., Retail Store Employees Union, Local 880 v. F.C.C., —— U.S. App. D.C. ——, 436 F.2d 248 (1970).

What then might be the "compelling indications" we are to consider? The ones which seem to us truly "compelling" involve First Amendment principles. Thus we conclude that the constitutional question must be faced and is, indeed, the essence of these cases. Whether our decision is styled as a "First Amendment decision" or as a decision interpreting the fairness and public interest requirements "in light of the First Amendment" matters little.

III

It has always been clear that the broadcast media—so vital to communication in our society—are affected by strong First Amendment interests.[10] Yet the nature of those interests has not been so clear; an evolution of constitutional principles in this area is still very much in progress. Until quite recently, the only interest raised to constitutional status was that of the broadcast licensees themselves. In a leading cae, the Commission's powers over program content were attacked and upheld with reference solely to the licensees' right of immunity from governmental interference with their "speech." The scarcity of broadcast frequencies was said to justify some regulation trenching on the broadcasters' First Amendment interests. National Broadcasting Co. v United States, 319 U.S. 190 (1943). These cases mark a new effort by members of the public to assert their First Amendment interests in the operations of radio and television.

There is scant precedent for such an effort. Indeed, the few previous attempts by individuals or groups to enforce their First Amendment interests in court have failed. In each case, the litigants have run up against not only an unreceptiveness to their constitutional theory, but also a crabbed judicial view of "state action"—a view that the "[First] Amendment limits only the action of Congress or of agencies of the federal government and not private corporations such as [broadcast licensees]." Massachusetts Universalist Convention v. Hildredth & Rogers Co., 1 Cir., 183 F.2d 497, 501 (1950); McIntire v. Wm. Penn Broadcasting Co. of Philadelphia, 3 Cir., 151 F.2d 597, 601 (1945). See also Post v. Payton, E.D. N.Y., 323 F.Supp. 799 (1971).

We believe the path is now clear of such doctrinal impedimenta. Perhaps the most important recent development is the Supreme Court's seminal decision in Red Lion Broadcasting Co., supra. There the Court upheld another aspect of the Commission's regulations of program content—the fairness doctrine's personal attack and campaign editorial rules. However, the Court's opinion went well beyond the scarcity rationale of the National Broadcasting Co. case. It justified the Commission's interference with broadcasters' free speech by invoking specifically constitutional rights of the general public which, it said, underlie and support the fairness doctrine rules at issue. Issuing what must become a clarion call for a new public concern and activism regarding the broadcast media, the Court stated that "the people as a whole retain their * * * collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment." [11] it went on to say:

> "* * * The right of free speech of a broadcaster * * * does not embrace a right to snuff out the free speech of others. * * *
> * * * * * * *
> "* * * [A] licensee has no constitutional right * * * to monopolize a radio frequency to the exclusion of his fellow citizens. * * *
> * * * * * * *
> "* * * It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount. * * *" [12]

Of course, the Red Lion Court had to invoke the public's First Amendment interests for a narrow purpose only—to uphold legislative and administrative action already taken. It did not have to reach the issue, presented in these cases, of invoking those interests for a direct attack on broadcasters' policies approved by the Commission. However, the language used by the Court is significantly expansive. It spoke of a First Amendment "right" held by "the people as a whole." A constitutional "right" is hardly deserving of the name if it can function only to permit legislative and administrative action and if its content depends entirely upon the current policies of the legislative and executive branches. The First Amendment, after all, contains nothing analogous to the fifth section of the Fourteenth Amendment, authorizing Congress to enforce constitutional interests unenforceable by the courts.[13]

For many purposes, it is proper to consider broadcast licensees as "private" businesses. Yet, for purposes of the First Amendment, "[o]wnership does not always mean absolute dominion." Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501, 506 (1946). "Conduct that is formally 'private' may become so entwined with governmental policies or so impregnated with a governmental character as to become subject to the constitutional limitations placed upon state action." Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296, 299 (1966). The Red Lion Court itself commented on the impermissibility of "private censorship" and cited old doctrine that "'[f]reedom of the press from governmental interference under the First Amendment does not sanction repression of that freedom by private interests.'"[14] The reach of the First Amendment, therefore, depends not upon "public"—"private" technicalities, but upon more functional considerations. They are (1) the governmental involvement in or public character of a particular enterprise, and (2) the importance or suitability of that enterprise for the communication of ideas.[15]

The last few decades of court decisions expanding the concept of "state action" have focused on myriad indicia of governmental involvement and public character. Many of them are apparently applicable to the operations of the broadcast industry.[16] But we need stress only two more basic factors which, taken together, bring broadcast licensees well within the ambit of the First Amendment for the purposes of these cases. First, the general characteristics of the broadcast industry reveal an extraordinary relationship between the broadcasters and the federal government—relationship which puts that industry in a class with few others.[17] It is one of "interdependence" and "joint participa[tion]." See Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 365 U.S. 715, 725 (1961). "[T]he [federal] regulatory system," it has been said, "is as much responsible for the existence of a broadcasting medium as the Bureau of Engraving is responsible for the existence of United States currency."[18] It has long been recognized that the airwaves are "a limited and valuable part of the public domain,"[19] leased out temporarily by the federal government which retains ultimate control over them.[20] Federal agency review and guidance of broadcasters' conduct is automatic, continuing and pervasive.[21] For broadcast licensees are considered the "proxies" or "fiduciaries" of the people.[22] Almost no other private business—almost no other regulated private business—is so intimately bound to government and to service to the commonweal.

[13] On the effect of the specific language in the fifth section of the Fourteenth Amendment, see Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970); Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641 (1966). Of course, the Fourteenth Amendment does not apply to federal regulation of the broadcast industry since no interference with the states is involved.

[14] 395 U.S. at 392, quoting Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945).

[15] Most "state action" cases, of course, have been concerned with equal protection rights under the Fourteenth Amendment rather than with free speech rights under the First Amendment. However, the principle of governmental involvement developed therein has been applied equally well in the First Amendment context. See, e.g., Public Utilities Comm'n v. Pollak, 343 U.S. 451 (1952); Farmer v. Moses, S.D. N.Y., 232 F. Supp. 154 (1964). The principle of "public character" may be found in decisions dealing directly with application of First Amendment rights to "private" entities. See, e.g., Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946); Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., 391 U.S. 308 (1968); Tanner v. Lloyd Corp., D. Ore., 308 F. Supp. 128 (1970); Diamond v. Bland, 91 Cal. Rptr. 501, 477 P. 2d 733 (1970). The importance and suitability of a particular place for the communication of ideas has been stressed in all of the cases cited above, as well as in all of the acess-to-public-forum cases, see Notes 40–43 infra.

[16] Dissenting in the BEM case now under review, Commissioner Johnson dealt exhaustively with the Supreme Court's state action doctrine, isolating eight separate indicia of "state action." He argued very strongly that all eight indicia apply to broadcast licensees. Business Executives Move for Vietnam Peace, supra Note 1, 25 F.C.C.2d at 253–261. Because this highly analytical—one might say mechanical—approach runs the risk of reading Supreme Court opinions for more than they mean, we have chosen to paint with a broader brush. Ours is the approach which the Supreme Court seems in fact to have used in the past.

[17] In particular, broadcasting may be easily distinguished from the newspaper industry in terms of "state action." In two recent decisions, courts have held that newspapers are not subject to the First Amendment. Associates & Aldrich Co., Inc. v. Times Mirror Co., 9 Cir., 440 F.2d 133 (1971); Chicago Joint Board v. Chicago Tribune Co., 7 Cir., ——— F.2d ———, 39 U.S. L. WEEK 2360 (December 17, 1970). While the governmental involvement in and public character of newspapers is surely less than that of broadcasting, we of course need express neither agreement nor disagreement with the cited decisions here.

[18] Pemberton, The Right of Access to Mass Media, in N. DORSEN (ed.), THE RIGHTS OF AMERICANS 277, 290 (1971). The Government is also directly responsible for the very existence of particular broadcasters. "[E]xisting broadcasters have often attained their

A second and even more important factor is the specific governmental involvement in the broadcasters, action now under review here. All of the cases in which previous courts have characterized broadcasters as mere "private corporations" immune from First Amendment constraints, see text at page 12 supra, have involved direct suits against broadcast licensees. In the cases before us now, however, the Commission has given its imprimatur to the flat ban on editorial advertising. It specifically considered and specifically authorized the flat ban. Thus we are called upon to review not simply a private decision, but a decision by a government agency, a decision which must inevitably provide guidance for future broadcaster action.

There is ample authority for the principle that specific governmental approval of or acquiescence in challanged action by a private organization indicates "state action."[23] Indeed, in a case similar to ours the Supreme Court held that a private bus company franchised by the federal government and regulated by the District of Columbia Public Utilities Commission could be subject to First Amendment constraints. It emphasized the specific regulatory acquiescence in the challenged action of the bus company:

> " * * * In finding [state action] we do not rely on the mere fact that Capital Transit operates a public utility on the streets of the District of Columbia under authority of Congress. Nor do we rely upon the fact that, by reason of such federal authorization, Capital Transit now enjoys a substantial monopoly of street railway and bus transportation in the District of Columbia. We do, however, recognize that Capital Transit operates its service under the regulatory supervision of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia which is an agency authorized by Congress. We rely particularly upon the fact that that agency, pursuant to protests against the [challenged action], ordered an investigation of it and, after formal public hearings, ordered its investigation dismissed on the ground that the public safety, comfort and convenience were not impaired thereby. * * *" present position because of their initial government selection in competition with others * * *. * * * [Their present] advantages are the fruit of a preferred position conferred by the Government." Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., supra Note 7, 395 U.S. at 400.

[20] The licensing-out or delegation of governmental authority has been an element in some of the Supreme Court's most expansive state action decisions. See Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296 (1966); Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 365 U.S. 715 (1961); Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944). The mere existence of a licensing or delegation relationship is not, of course, enough by itself to establish state action; licensed pharmacists cannot be equated with licensed broadcasters. The actual extent of governmental involvement and the public character of the enterprise in question remain the final tests of state action.

[21] The activities of a governmental regulatory agency have also been emphasized in at least one of the Supreme Court's expansive state action decisions. See Public Utilities Comm'n v. Pollak, supra Note 15, 343 U.S. at 462, citing American Communications Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 401 (1950) ("[W]hen authority derives in part from Government's thumb on the scales, the exercise of that power by private persons becomes closely akin, in some respects, to its exercise by Government itelf.").

[22] See Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., supra Note 7, 395 U.S. at 394, 396; Office of Communication of United Church of Christ v. F.C.C., supra Note 8, 123 U.S. App. D.C. at 337, 359 F.2d at 1003.

[23] The Supreme Court has said that "action of state courts and judicial officers in their official capacities is to be regarded as action of the State * * *." Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 14 (1948). See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964); Van Alstyne, Mr. Justice Black, Constitutional Review, and the Talisman of State Action, 1965 DUKE L. J. 219, 227–230. See also this court's discussion of the Shelley principle—which surely must apply to actions of a federal administrative agency specifically approving private action—in Edwards v. Habib, 130 U.S. App. D.C. 126, 397 F. 2d 687 (1968). Specific governmental acquiescence, as well as specific approval, has also been a focus of Supreme Court state action decisions. See Marsh v. Alabama, supra Note 15, 326 U.S. at 507 & n. 4, 509; Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority, supra Note 20, 365 U.S. at 725.

Broadcasting's importance and suitability for communication of ideas need not be labored. Mere presence of large and appropriate audiences (and thus opportunities for effective communication) has sometimes been emphasized by the courts to show the relevance of First Amendment protections.[24] In Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., 391 U.S. 308 (1968), for example, the Supreme Court held that a privately owned shopping center was an appropriate place for the "speech" of labor union picketers. It stressed "[t]he large-scale movement of the country's population from the cities to the suburbs [that] has been accompanied by the advent of the suburban shopping center * * *." Id. at 324. With this demographic change, the "speech" that once took place on the public streets around downtown shopping areas must be allowed to move to privately owned parking areas in the suburbs, for that is where the relevant audiences now are. The technological and cultural changes connected to the current preeminence of the broadcast media as our primary means of communication are no less striking. The soap box orator and the leafleter are becoming almost obsolescent; their Saturday afternoon audiences have increasingly moved indoors—in front of their television sets.[25]

Moreover, unlike most of the private entities held to be subject to First Amendment constraints, the broadcast media are specifically dedicated to communication. They function as both our foremost forum for public speech and our most important educator of an informed people. In a populous democracy, the only means of truly mass communication must play an absolutely crucial role in the processes of self-government and free expression, so central to the First Amendment. That can be said of almost no other "private" enterprise.

IV

Broadcast licensees, then, serve not only as "speakers" but also as administrators of a highly valuable communications resource, subject to First Amendment constraints. Their dual role demands that their own constitutional interests in free speech coexist with those of the general public. But what are the dimensions of the public's First Amendment interests in the operation of radio and television? And how do they apply to the issue of editorial advertising?

It is particularly important that these cases deal only with the public's First Amendment interests in broadcasters' allocation of advertising time. They deal only with time relinquished by broadcasters to others; petitioners argue only that, in relinquishing that time, broadcasters must not discriminate against protected expression. In normal programming time, closely controlled and edited by broadcasters, the constellation of constitutional interests would be substantially different. In news and documentary presentations, for example, the broadcasters' own interests in free speech are very, very strong.[26] The Commission's fairness doctrine properly leaves licensees broad leeway for professional judgment in that area. But in the allocation of advertising time, the broadcasters have no such strong First Amendment interests. Their speech is not at issue; rather, all that is at issue is their decision as to which other parties will be given an opportunity to speak.

Though the broadcasters themselves have no substantial First Amendment interest in the allocation of advertising time, we might expect that the interest of members of the public—potential advertisers—would be quite strong. However, the Commission and the broadcaster-intervenors have argued just the opposite. They contend that the public's constitutional concerns do not extend to advertising time. Thus we must decide whether the substantial block of the broadcast day devoted to advertising is but a vacuum, devoid of First Amendment constraints, in the midst of a medium powerfully affected by those constraints—a desert in the midst of an oasis.

[24] See, e.g., Wolin v. Port of New York Authority, 2 Cir., 392 F. 2d 83, 90–91 (1968) ("The propriety of a place for use as a public forum * * * [may be established if] the place is where the relevant audience may be found."). Of course, the cases before us involve the right to speak on a medium of communication, not in a particular place. Thus many of the considerations are different; but the basic concern with the ability to reach to relevant audience applies in both situations.

[25] The Supreme Court has noted that broadcast "technology * * * supplants atomized, relatively informal communication with mass media as a prime source of national cohesion and news * * *." Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., supra Note 7, 395 U.S. at 386 n. 15.

[26] See id. at 396.

The Commission and intervenors work from the following premise. They define the public's overall constitutional interests in the operations of radio and television quite narrowly. The public's only interest, they suggest, is as viewers and listeners—not as speakers. They cite to us the Red Lion Court's mention of "the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral and other ideas and experiences" over the broadcast media.[27] And they read that statement to set forth not only an interest of the public, but the only interest of the public.

Working from that premise, the Commission and intervenors contend that the public already receives "suitable access" to controversial views on normal programming time. Application of the fairness doctrine's requirement of full and fair coverage of public issues in non-advertising time, they suggest, insures that all views on these issues will in fact be presented. They assume that editorial advertising adds nothing new to the debate. The fairness guarantee alone, they say, is enough to eliminate petitioners' claim on advertising time—and enough to satisfy the First Amendment. We disagree.

Surely the public's interest in free access to the full spectrum of ideas and controversial views on radio and television is highly important. The right to receive ideas and information is deeply rooted in First Amendment law.[28] The Red Lion Court stressed that right, since it was the one primarily relevant to the fairness doctrine rules at issue in the case. But we do not believe that the Red Lion decision makes the goal of an informed public the exclusive First Amendment interest constraining broadcasters. Certainly the Supreme Court has done so in no other context.

The public has a First Amendment interest in the mode or manner—as well as the content—of public debate aired on the broadcast media. The Red Lion Court itself stated specifically that "[i]t is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas [in the broadcast media]."[29] This court, similarly, has said that the Commission is obliged to administer the airwaves 'in such a manner that * * * debate on public issues is 'uninhibited, robust and wide-open.'" National Ass'n of Theatre Owners v. F.C.C., 136 U.S. App. D.C. 352, 365, 420 F.2d 194, 207 (1969). The reference to "uninhibited" debate is, of course, borrowed from the Supreme Court's decision in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964). The Court there extended First Amendment protection to some forms of libel on public officials. It made clear that the Amendment's concern extends beyond the mere fostering of speech whose content will properly inform the public. The New York Times decision establishes a strong First Amendment interest in vigorous, "wide-open" public debate.

Furthermore, we must take note of a third—but, perhaps, most important—First Amendment interest. That is the interest of individuals and groups in effective self-expression. The Red Lion Court did say that "it is idle to posit an unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish."[30] For, as it pointed out, broadcast time is necessarily limited. But the limited nature of broadcast time does not dictate that the individual and group interest in self-expression be brushed aside entirely; it allows for a reasonably regulated, "abridgeable" right to speak. The First Amendment values of individual self-fulfillment through expression and individual participation in public debate have long been recognized.[31] We all have an interest in speaking up ourselves as well as in hearing others. It is too late to argue that the First Amendment protects ideas but not an individual's interest in expressing them and doing so in his own way.

We conclude, then, that the public's First Amendment interests constrain broadcasters not only to provide the full spectrum of viewpoints, but also to present them in an uninhibited, wide-open fashion and to provide opportunity for individual self-expression.[32] How do these three First Amendment interests relate to a more specific interest in the airing of editorial advertisements? The answer emerges when we understand the special importance of advertising time to our system of free expression. First, the initial decision to produce an editorial advertisement is in the hands of members of the public. The initiative to present a particular view does not have to come from a member of the broadcaster's staff. Second, a paid advertisement is basically controlled and edited by the advertiser. He is allowed to present his views in a fashion chosen by himself. If an individual is interviewed for a news program, he may expect his comments to be abbreviated and edited; reporters' commentary will qualify what he has to say. For it is the broadcasters' responsibility to be objective, to condense issues into available time for presentation, and to play up or play down views acocrding to the broadcaster's opinion of what is important and interesting. But when an individual or group buys time to say its piece, the crucial controls are in its own hands. Editorial advertising is thus a special and separate mode of expression, not simply a duplication of other expression on the same medium.[33]

[32] Of course, all three of these interests apply to non-advertising time as well as to advertising time. The Commission, in fact, has encouraged broadcasters to present conflicting

The importance of initiative and control to the First Amendment interests in wide-open debate and individual self-expression should be obvious. Vigorous, free expression is promoted when members of the public have some opportunity to take the initiative and editorial control into their own hands on the broadcast media. It has traditionally been thought that the best judge of the importance of a particular viewpoint or issue is the individual or group holding the viewpoint and wishing to communicate it to others. In the First Amendment area, our best guarantee has always been a "free market" in which partisans who feel strongly on particular issues may decide on their own to speak out and to speak out in their own way. The present system, allowing a flat ban on editorial advertising, conforms instead to a paternalistic structure in which licensees and bureaucrats decide what issues are "important," how "fully" to cover them, and the format, time and style of the coverage.

Even if broadcasters were to succeed in presenting a full spectrum of viewpoints and partisan spokesmen on non-advertising time, their retention of total initiative and editorial control is inimical to the First Amendment. The importance of fair, objective and full treatment of controversial issues on normal programming cannot be doubted. But, as the Supreme Court has said in the context of classroom debate, "supervised and ordained discussion" is not enough. Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969). "The Nation's future depends upon leaders trained through wide exposure to that robust exchange of ideas which discovers truth 'out of a multitude of tongues, [rather] than through any kind of authoritative selection.'" Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 603 (1967). In other words, there is always a strong First Amendment interest expression.[34] views through partisan voices as well as through predigested commentary. See Democratic National Committee, supra Note 1, 25 F.C.C. 2d at 222–223. However, as we make clear in text, the selective, edited presentation by the Government's licensee of partisan voices on news shows, for example, does not erase the special advantages of allowing self-selected partisan voices on advertising time.

[33] See text at pages 27–29 & Note 37 infra. See also Note, A Fair Break for Controversial Speakers: Limitations of the Fairness Doctrine and the Need for Individual Access, 39 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 532, 557–560 (1971).

[34] We are cognizant of current proposals to reform the Commission's fairness doctrine and invigorate its enforcement, so lackluster in the past. We recommend the Commission's consideration of new roles to "encourage and implement" presentation of opposing viewpoints by reemphasizing the obligation to "seek out" controversial issues. Obligations of Broadcast Licensee Under the Fairness Doctrine, 35 FED. REG. 7820 (1970). But, as the Commission says, the proposed rules would be but a "modest * * * step in promoting access to the media." Id. at 7821. They go little beyond the present obligation to give "full" coverage to controversial issues. Such an obligation is inherently difficult to define and enforce. At best, the Commission can evaluate only the general willingness of a licensee to "seek out" issues and glaring examples of noncoverage of obviously important issues. The Commission cannot be expected to engage licensees in fine debates over coverage of less obviously life-or-death issues. But the fundamental point—the point we emphasize—is that no matter how "fully" controversial issues might be covered in a perfect broadcasting world, the basic initiative and control remains with the licensee. Because there is not even a partial "free market" opening to the public at large, the crucial First Amendment interests in decentralized initiative and control go unsatisfied.

We realize that there is another possible, but purely speculative, reformation of the fairness doctrine now under consideration which might be supposed to obviate the need for a measure of "free market" access to advertising time. It has been proposed that licensees be required to provide self-edited advertising time to groups or individuals under the fairness doctrine only when a commercial advertiser has already taken a controversial position in his broadcast messages. Such an approach has been taken regarding cigarette advertisements, though that case was said to be extraordinary and not to establish a general precedent. Banzhaf v. F.C.C., 132 U.S. App. D.C. 14, 405 F. 2d 1082 (1968). But even if that principle were made to apply generally, it would leave the initiative solely in the

Even in terms of the public's First Amendment interest emphasized by the Commission and intervenors—the interest of "viewers and listeners" in passive access to the full spectrum of viewpoints on radio and television—editorial advertising plays an important role. The concept of "full" coverage of "controversial" issues "of public importance" is vague to say the least, and leaves much to the broadcasters' diiscretion (and possible oversight).[35] Assuming that broadcasters are sometimes fallible, the goal of a fully informed public is best attained by opening of outlets for members of the public to supplement the licensees' assessments of "importance," "controversiality" and "full" coverage. The Commission's and intervenors' argument might be somewhat stronger if it were designed to support a partial ban on editorial advertising concerning issues and views which have in fact been substantially aired on normal programming time.[36] The argument is unconvincing, however, in support of a flat, per se ban on any and all editorial advertisements.

Moreover, even if "antiwar views," for example, have in fact been presented on news and interview shows, it is not necessarily clear that a particular antiwar editorial advertisement would add nothing to the public's information and understanding. "Viewpoints" cannot be so neatly and infallibly catalogued as the Commission would have us believe. Self-expression and public debate are much more subtle phenomena; matters of style and intensity of feeling are important components.[37] Again, an across-the-board ban on editorial advertisements—leaving the quality of public debate in the control of one licensee, supplemented by no other autonomous inputs—may well ignore opportunities to enliven and enrich the public's overall information.

We recognize, of course, that the onesidedness and private editing of particular "spot" editorial advertisements may in the end steer viewers and listeners always from the "truth" by distorting complex issues. Being brief, these "spot" messages—no less than normal broadcast news coverage—may not canvass all possible arguments or develop all possible implications of the position they espouse. But that does not mean that they are unprotected by the First Amendment. Our Constitution protects many forms of misleading and overly simplified political expression in order to ensure robust, wide-open debate. "[N]either factual error nor defamatory content suffices to remove the constitutional shield from criticism of official conduct * * *." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra, 376 U.S. at 273. Nor does the brevity of the criticism. We must, then, be very, very slow to judge any sort of speech on public issues worthless. The marketplace of ideas protected by the First Amendment, after all, is not governed by the tastes and intellectual standards of the universities or the broadcast newsroom—or even of judicial chambers.

We conclude, therefore, that the fairness doctrine's goal of full and fair coverage of issues on normal programming time does not eliminate the public's interest in a further, complementary airing of controversial views during advertising time. We must concur in the Supreme Court's only recorded comments on hands of commercial advertisers: the only issues on which noncommercial groups and individuals could speak through editorial advertisements would be those issues which commercial advertisers had already chosen to raise themselves. Allowing such a narrow group, motivated largely by business profit, to set the agenda for editorial advertising is unconscionable and contrary to First Amendment precepts. It is crucial that noncommercial groups and individuals have the same rights of initiative as commercial advertisers.

[35] The guarantees of full and fair coverage have proved particularly difficult to define and enforce in the past. They have taken on effective meaning only in the most extreme cases of broadcaster irresponsibility. For a depressing critique of the Commission's apparent inability to enforce its own standards, see Cox & Johnson, Broadcasting in America and the FCC's License Renewal Process: An Oklahoma Case Study, 14 F.C.C.2d 1 (1968).

[36] Even then, however, the special attributes of editorial advertising would not be eliminated by the broadcaster's own coverage. See text at pages 23–25 supra & pages 27–29 infra.

[37] In Lee v. Board of Regents of State Colleges, W.D. Wis., 306 F. Supp. 1097 (1969), affirmed, 7 Cir., 441 F.2d 1257 (1971), the court held that a school newspaper was obliged under the First Amendment to print antiwar editorial advertising, even though antiwar views could be printed in the newspaper's news and letters-to-the-editor columns. The court stressed the qualitative—and valuable—difference in expression of views through an editorial advertisement. "It is readily apparent," it said, "that a paid advertisement can be cast in such a form as to command much greater attention than a letter to the editor. Large type, photographs, repeated publication and full pages of space are some of the modes of expression available in an editorial advertisement that might not be available in a letter to the editor." Id. at 1101. Another court has come to the same result in a newspaper editorial advertising case. Zucker v. Panitz, S.D. N.Y., 299 F.Supp. 102 (1969). See text at pages 31–32 infra.

constitutional protection for editorial advertising—comments made in the context of newspapers, like broadcasting a medium which may be expected, if not required, to present the various sides of public issues in its non-advertising space. The Court said that editorial advertisements, unlike commercial advertisements,[38] are of fundamental First Amendment concern, since they deal with political questions. And it protected them from libel law attack to the same extent as the newspapers' own editorial columns, for

We come now to the aspect of the broadcasters' policy which, petitioners say, trenches on the First Amendment interest in editorial advertising. The constitutional defect of that policy is somewhat ironic. The New York Times Court made clear that the fact distinguishing fully protected editorial advertising from less fully protected commercial advertising is that the former deals with controversial public issues. Indeed, the political nature of editorial advertising places it near the core of the First Amendment. However, the very characteristic which affords it strict constitutional protection is also the characteristic causing the broadcasters' challenged policy to single it out and exclude it from the airwaves. That, we believe, is the crucial aspect of these cases.

It is important to note that petitioners do not attack the exclusion of editorial advertising by broadcasters who accept no advertisements whatever.[39] We do not have to decide whether the broadcast medium inherently amounts to a "public forum" on the order of public streets or parks or meeting halls or even bus terminals.[40] We leave open the possibility that broadcasters may constitutionally relinquish no time at all for advertising of any sort. For the issue in these cases is the permissibility of discrimination, within a given block of advertising time, against "controversial" speech and in favor of commercial and "noncontroversial" speech. We deal here with a forum that already has been opened up by the licensees themselves, opened up for direct broadcast presentations by members of the public.

Fortunately, we do not write on a clean slate in this area. Six courts have confronted discriminations among types of speech like the one challenged here. Every one of them—four federal courts and two state supreme courts—has held that once a forum, subject to First Amendment constraints, has been opened up for commercial and "noncontroversial" advertising, a ban on "controversial" editorial advertising is unconstitutional unless clearly justified by a "clear and present danger." Lee v. Board of Regents of State Colleges, W.D. Wis., 306 F.Supp. 1097 (1969), affirmed, 7 Cir., 441 F.2d 1257 (1971); Zucker v. Panitz, S.D. N.Y., 299 F.Supp. 102 (1969); Kissinger v. New York City Transit Authority, S.D. N.Y., 274 F.Supp. 438 (1967); Hillside Community Church, Inc. v. City of Tacoma, Wash., 455 P.2d 350 (1969); Wirta v. Alameda-Contra Costa Transit District, 64 Cal.Rptr 430, 434 P.2d 982 (1967). We join this unbroken line of authority.

First Amendment doctrine governing access to forums for communication has been elaborated often in recent years. The essential test is an exercise in balancing, though weighted in favor of First Amendment values.[41] On one hand, the court must assess the constitutionality protected interest in the particular expressive activity in the particular forum. On the other hand, it must assess the importance of other uses of the forum which may be threatened and the extent to which they actually will be disrupted. Access may be denied only if the disruption caused by a particular type of expression (e.g., public speaking, marching, picketing) clearly overrides the "preferred" interest in free speech. Thus there is some right of access by demonstration to state capitol grounds [42] but not to a jailyard.[43]

[38] Commercial advertising—indeed, any sort of commercial speech—is less fully protected than other speech, because it generally does not communicate ideas and thus is not directly related to the central purpose of the First Amendment. See Breard v. City of Alexandria, 341 U.S. 622 (1951); Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942).

[39] DNC's position is somewhat ambiguous. The ruling which it requested from the Commission would, by its terms, apply to all broadcasters, whether or not they accept any advertising. See text at page 6 supra. However, on appeal DNC's arguments have been focused entirely on broadcasters who do already accept noncontroversial advertising. The interests of particular licensees in keeping all advertising off the air were not explored before the Commission or before this court—for example, an all music station may have a very substantial interest in broadcasting no paid announcements. Because the special issues relating to such licensees were not presented here, we do not decide them.

[40] See, e.g., Schneider v. State, 308 147 (1939); Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939); Wolin v. Port of New York Authority, supra Note 24. See generally Kalven, The Concept of the Public Forum: Cox v. Louisiana, 1965 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1.

Ordinarily, courts have to make the basic balancing judgment on their own. However, when the administrator of a forum has determined to grant access to some speakers or some picketers, he has implicitly made that basic judgment himself. When some public speaking is allowed in a park, the park's administrator has determined that the normal and proper functions of the park will not be excessively harmed by public speaking. If he then attempts to deny access to other public speakers, he cannot be heard to claim the opposite. The burden is on him to show some very substantial factor distinguishing the disruption they would cause from that caused by the speaking or picketing already allowed.

The same principle applies to broadcasters who have opened their forum to commercial speech but would close it to controversial political speech. By opening up a forum for some paid presentations, independently edited and controlled by members of the public, the broadcasters have waived any argument that advertising is inherently disruptive of the proper function of their stations. The exclusion of only one sort of advertising—which we have shown to have great First Amendment value—is then highly suspect, a prima facie constitutional violation. To justify the exclusion, there must be a substantial factor distinguishing the disruptive effect of editorial advertising from that of commercial advertising.

The content of the idea which the excluded speakers seek to promote is—emphatically—not permitted as a distinguishing factor in itself. Indeed, the existence of an exclusionary discrimination apparently based on the content of ideas presents an additional, or greatly heightened, prima facie constitutional violation. Both free speech and equal protection principles condemn any discrimination among speakers which is based on what they intend to say.[44] If the First Amendment prohibits anything at all, it must be a censorial discrimination among ideas. And since First Amendment rights have been held to be "fundamental rights" triggering the strict standard of review under equal protection principles, Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 30–31 (1968), it is doubly clear that the burden of justifying any apparent discrimination is very great indeed.

At least 20 years ago, the Supreme Court began condemning discriminations among different exercises of the same type of expression. Fowler v. Rhode Island, 354 U.S. 67 (1953); Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268, 272–273 (1951). Both cases involved access to a forum already opened to others. More recently, the Court in Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965), invalidated a state regulation that permitted labor picketing but not civil rights picketing. In his concurrence, Mr. Justice Black stated that this sort of discrimination is "censorship in a most odious form" and violates both the First Amendment and the equal protection clause. Id. at 581. Similarly, in Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39 (1966), the Court upheld a ban on demonstrations in a jailyard, but was careful to note that "[t]here is not a shred of evidence in this record * * * [the demonstrators were excluded] because the sheriff objected to what was being sung or said by the demonstrators or because he disagreed with the objectives of their protest." Id. at 47.

No doubt a discrimination against all controversial speech—such as we face in these cases—is somewhat less "odious" than a discrimination among different controversial viewpoints on particular issues. But it is a form of censorship just the same.[45] It is a favoritism toward the status quo and public apathy and, in these cases, a favoritism toward bland commercialism.[46] Such favoritism flies in the face of the First Amendment, whose central purpose is to protect and promote controversy, "uninhibited, robust and wide-open," on public issues.

[41] Most of the cases, other than those cited above in text, have involved access to particular places in order to perform expressive activities such as speaking, leafleting, or demonstrating in some fashion. For general discussions of the cases and the principles applied, see H. KALVEN, THE NEGRO AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT (paper ed. 1965); Note, Regulation of Demonstrations, 80 HARV. L. REV. 1773 (1967). There is no reason why the general principles applied in cases involving access to places should not apply to our cases involving access to a particular medium of expression. See Note 24 supra.

[44] For discussions of the First Amendment-equal protection intersection, see Blasi, Prior Restraints on Demonstrations, 68 MICH. L. REV. 1482, 1492–1497 (1970); Kalven, supra Note 40, 1965 SUP. CT. REV. at 29–30; Van Alstyne, Political Speakers at Universities: Some Constitutional Considerations, 111 U. PA. L. REV. 328, 337–339 (1963).

Moreover, it is by no means clear that a broadcasters' ban on "controversial" advertising does not impermissibly open the door to a sub rosa discrimination among controversial ideas. The term "controversial" is extraordinarily vague. Some advertisements may not be deemed "controversial"—and may not even be "controversial" for purposes of the fairness doctrine [47]—but may still express ideas, the negative of which would surely be labeled "controversial." [48] Ads for Radio Free Europe or Army recruiting, for example, may be allowed unanswered on the air, while ads calling the notion of the "free world" a sham or ads calling the Army a threat to democracy would be banned entirely. The line between ideological and nonideological presentations is an almost impossible one to draw. All too often in our society one particular ideology—that of passivity, acceptance of things as they are, and exhaltation of commercial values—is simply taken for granted, assumed to be a nonideology, and allowed to choke out all the rest.[49]

Thus the editorial advertising ban, particularly when licensees accept advertising generally, establishes an unmistakable infringing of First Amendment liberties. The Commission and the broadcasters, then, bear a very heavy burden of justification. Whether we require a "compelling" justification, an "overriding" justification, or a "clear and present danger" is relatively unimportant.

VI

It being established that there is a strong and specific First Amendment interest in editorial advertising and that the policies discriminatorily barrng such expression work a prima facie violation of constitutional principles, we must consider the countervailing considerations raised by the Commission and the broadcaster-intervenors. In order to justify the policy at issue, they must show some very substantial harm that would be caused by acceptance of editorial advertising—a sort of harm great enough to override the First Amendment interests at stake and a sort of harm not already involved in the acceptance of commercial and "noncontroversial" advertising. Only such a showing could convince us that the ban on editorial advertisements is supported by sufficient countervailing values and is not based solely on the content of the ideas conveyed.

The Commission and intervenors have begun from the assumption that our holding for petitioners would deprive broadcast licensees of their highly prized editorial independence and control over their frequencies, giving editorial advertisers a right to air time which commercial advertisers do not presently have. They have argued that petitioners seek the right to "grab the mike" from broadcasters' hands.[50] The result, they say, would be a three-fold disaster. First, they foresee "'a return to the chaotic situation of radio's early days'"[51] when too many hands grabbing for too few mikes made successful broadcasting impossible. Second, they argue that compulsory acceptance of editorial advertising would allow a few rich individuals or groups to buy up great blocks of time to purvey views on only one side of important issues, thus grossly unbalancing the broadcast station's treatment of those issues. And third, they point out that broadcasters compelled to accept editorial advertisements on one side of an issue would then be required by the fairness doctrine to accept at least some advertisements on the other side—free of charge if necessary. Provision of such free advertising time, they say, would cut into the broadcasters' revenues and might bring financial collapse.

[45] In Wirta v. Alameda-Contra Costa Transit District, 64 Cal. Rptr. 430, 434 P. 2d 982, 986 (1967), the California Supreme Court came to the same conclusion as we do on this issue, saying:

> "* * * The vice is not that the district has preferred one point of view over another, but that it chooses between classes of ideas entitled to constitutional protection, sanctioning the expression of only those selected, and banning others. Thus the district's regulation exercises a most pervasive form of censorship.
> "* * * [T]he district's policy * * * affords total freedom of the forum to mercantile messages while banning the vast majority of opinions and beliefs extant which enjoy First Amendment protection because of their noncommercialism. No statistical data is required to demonstrate that in the totality of man's communicable knowledge, that which bears no relationship to material value preponderates."

The Supreme Court of Washington specifically adopted this view in Hillside Community Church, Inc. v. City of Tacoma, Wash., 455 P. 2d 350, 353 (1969).

[46] Commissioner Johnson commented in his dissent that broadcasters "have created a system in which immediate access is granted to one, privileged class of applicants: the commercial peddler of goods and services. * * * We have an individual right of access, all right, but only for hucksters of industrial garbage." Democratic National Committee, supra Note 1, 25 F.C.C.2d at 223.

[47] See Banzhaf v. F.C.C., 132 U.S. App. D.C. 14, 405 F. 2d 1082 (1968); Green v. F.C.C., —— U.S. App. D.C. ——, —— F. 2d —— (Nos. 24470 & 24516, decided June 18, 1971).

[48] In Wirta v. Alameda-Contra Costa Transit District, supra Note 45, 434 P. 2d at 987, the California Supreme Court made the same point very forcefully, and provided several telling examples:

> "* * * A lumber company may advertise its wood products, but a conservation group cannot implore citizens to write to the President or Governor about protecting our natural resources. An oil refinery may advertise its products, but a citizens' organization cannot demand enforcement of existing air pollution statutes. An insurance company may announce its available policies, but a senior citizens' club cannot plead for legislation to improve our social security program."

[49] See generally C. Waxman (ed.), The End of Ideology Debate (1969).

The arguments of the Commission and intervenors fall well short of the mark. The reason is that they have apparently misunderstood the narrowness of the issue here. All that we are considering is the permissibility of a total, flat ban on editorial advertising. All petitioners ask is that broadcasters be required to accept some editorial advertising. They do not advocate an absolute right to air their advertisements. As the Red Lion Court made clear, there could not be any such absolute right because advertising time, like all broadcast time, is severely limited. See text at page 23 supra. Under the Communications Act, broadcasters are not "common carriers" obliged to accept any advertising message that is submitted.[52] And petitioners do not argue that they should be. What petitioners do argue is that editorial advertisements should at least be considered and that some should be aired.

Such a modest reform would not substantially undermine broadcasters' editorial control over their frequencies. For broadcasters would retain full latitude to control the content of their programming. Their editorial control over non-advertising time would not be disturbed whatever. All that would be affected is their allocation of advertising time—an area in which editorial control over content has never been of major importance. The interest in deciding which advertisements to accept is not as great as in deciding what public issues to cover and how to cover them on news presentations, for example. See text at page 20 supra. It surely cannot be equated, as the Commission and intervenors suggest, with the interest of law review editors in deciding what articles to publish. See Avins v. Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, 3 Cir., 385 F.2d 151 (1967), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 920 (1968). A broadcaster traditionally is not nearly as involved in the preparation and editing of advertisements as a law review staff is in the preparation and editing of articles.

Within the affected block of advertising time, neither chaos nor anything approaching chaos would follow the modest reform at issue. For, again, broadcasters would retain wide-ranging control. It is well established in First Amendment law governing access to forums that "reasonable regulations" may be promulgated and enforced to limit the exercise of free speech.[53] At the least, there may be regulations determining the time, place and manner of speech. They may not be used to stifle speech, but they are absolutely necessary to see that too many groups speaking at once do not drown out one another or trench overly much on the normal uses to which the forum is put by the public in general. The same principle applies to broadcasters' methods for allocating advertising time. All that petitioners condemn here are regulations providing that public issue advertising may be aired "at no time, in no place and in no manner" over the broadcast media.

Clearly, for example, broadcasters are entitled to place an outside limit on the [52] 47 U.S.C. § 153(h) (1964). The Commission and intervenors argue that this "common carrier" provision would be declared unconstitutional if we were to decide for petitioners in these cases. That, of course, is absolutely incorrect. The Commission and intervenors also point to a part of the Communications Act providing that if a station permits one candidate for office to use its facilities, it must then permit others equal time, but providing also that "[n]o obligation is imposed upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate." 47 U.S.C. § 315(a) (1964). This statutory provision squares perfectly with our holding that a broadcaster is not necessarily obliged to provide any time for advertisements, but that if he does sell some advertising time he may not totally exclude editorial advertising.

[53] See, e.g., Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., 391 U.S. 308, 320 (1968); Note, supra Note 15.

total amount of editorial advertising they will sell. To fail to impose some such limit would be to deny the public the other sorts of programming which it legitimately expects on radio and television. Similarly, "reasonable regulation" of the placement of advertisements is altogether proper. No advertiser has a right to air his presentation at any particular point in an evening's programming. Nor does he have a right to clog a particular time segment with his messages. A regulation of all editorial advertising to non-"prime time" or any other major discrimination in the placement of editorial advertisements would no doubt go too far. But there is still room for broad exercise of the broadcasters' discretion.

We need not define the precise control which broadcasters may exercise over editorial advertising. Rather, the point is that by requiring that some such advertising be accepted, we leave the Commission and licensees broad latitude to develop "reasonable regulations" which will avoid any possibility of chaos and confusion. The spectre of chaos and "mike grabbing" raised by the Commission and intervenors here is, as petitioners say, a "'bogus issue." Broadcasters, after all, have dealt quite successfully with the scheduling problems involved with commercial advertising. We require only that noncommercial advertisers be treated in the same evenhanded way. Although many broadcasters already do allow editorial advertisements on the air, we have not been shown one reason, drawn from their experience, to suggest that chaos has resulted.

Beyond the mistaken suggestion of administrative apocalypse, the Commission and intervenors have raised a more plausible and important claim, involving the danger that a few individuals or groups might come to dominate editorial advertising time. Of course, the mere fact that wealthy people may use their opportunities to speak more effectively than other people is not enough to justify eliminating those opportunities entirely. It takes more money to operate a magazine or newspaper—or, for that matter, a broadcast station—than to buy a segment of time for an editorial advertisement. Yet we are not reluctant to provide strict First Amendment protection for the operators of magazines, newspapers and broadcast stations. The real problem, then, is not that editorial advertising will cost money, but that it may be dominated by only one group from one part of the political spectrum. A onesided flood of editorial advertisements could hardly be called the "robust, wide-open" debate which the people have a right to expect on radio and television.

Again, however, invalidation of a flat ban on editorial advertising does not close the door to "reasonable regulations" designed to prevent domination by a few groups or a few viewpoints. Within a general regime of accepting some editorial advertisements, there is room for the Commission and licensees to develop such guidelines.[54] For example, there could be some outside limits on the amount of advertising time that will be sold to one group or to representatives of one particular narrow viewpoint. The licensee should not begin to exercise the same "authoritative selection" in editorial advertising which he exercises in normal programming. See text at pages 24–25 supra. However, we are confident of the Commission's ability to set down guidelines which avoid that danger.

We are no less confident of its ability to deal reasonably with the final problem it has raised that relating to licensees' fairness obligations. Invalidation of a flat ban on editorial advertising, of course, leaves the Commission the power to require that if editorial advertisements are accepted on one side of an issue, then broadcasters must also accept at least some advertisements on the other side of the issue, free of charge if necessary. See Cullman Broadcasting Co., 40 F.C.C. 576 (1963). The result of such a reasonable regulation, however, need not be financial disaster. Indeed, it is incredible that the Commission would enforce a rule so rigid that licensees would be driven out of business.[55] If the obligation to provide some free time for answering editorial advertisements were shown to threaten actual financial harm to particular broadcasters, the Commission could make necessary adjustments.[56]

[54] In the context of regulating demonstrations or picketing, guidelines which limit access because the same or similar groups had already had substantial access would be unusual and perhaps impermissible. However, the interest in maintaining some degree of balance on the broadcast media is particularly great. And "the characteristics of news media justify differences in the First Amendment standards applied to them." Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., supra Note 7, 395 U.S. at 386.

[55] We note that the Commission's requirement of free time for antismoking was administered generously toward the financial concerns of licensees and, indeed, few broadcasters seem to have been deterred from accepting cigarette commercials as a result. See National Broadcasting Co., Inc., 16 F.C.C.2d 947 (1969).

[56] See Note, Fairness Doctrine: Television as a Marketplace of Ideas, 45 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 1222, 1249 (1970). We must be somewhat skeptical of the talk about financial disaster

We conclude that none of the spectres raised by the Commission and intervenors—spectres of chaos, grossly unbalanced programming and financial disaster—is enough to justify a flat ban on editorial advertising. What real problems there are may be dealt with while the acceptance of some editorial advertisements is required. The keynote must be a scheme of reasonable regulation, administered by the licensee and guided by the Commission. At least in the past, the Commission has not considered this task so impossible. Twenty-five years ago it decided a case in which a union charged that a broadcaster was violating free speech rights by refusing to sell program time for the airing of controversial views. The Commission stated:

> " * * * The spirit of the Communications Act of 1934 requires radio to be an instrument of free speech, subject only to general statutory provisions imposing upon the licensee the responsibility of operating its station in the public interest. * * *
> " * * * No single or exact rule of thumb for providing time, on a nondiscriminatory basis, can be stated for application to all situations which may arise in the operation of all stations. The Commission, however, is of the opinion that the operation of any station under the extreme principles that no time shall be sold for teh discussion of controversial public issues and that only charitable organizations and certain commercial interests may solicit memberships is inconsistent with the concept of public interest * * * . The Commission recognizes that good program balance may not permit the sale or donation of time to all who may seek it for such purposes and that difficult problems calling for careful judgment on the part of station management may be involved in deciding among applicants for time when all cannot be accommodated. However, competent management should be able to meet such problems in the public interest and with fairness to all concerned. The fact that it placed an arduous task on management should not be made a reason for evading the issue by a strict rule against the sale of time for any programs of the type mentioned."

United Broadcasting Co., 10 F.C.C. 515, 517–518 (1945). We agree with those views, and see no reason why the Commission and broadcast licensees should be any less competent in 1971 than they were in 1945. Given a scheme of reasonable regulation, there is no reason why acceptance of editorial advertising should cause any substantial harm or disruption not already involved in the acceptance of other advertising. Therefore, to single out and exclude editorial advertising is to violate the First Amendment of the Constitution.

VII

On the basis of the foregoing, we reverse the Commission's decision that a flat ban on all editorial advertising is permissible. However, we remand these cases to the Commission for further consideration. On remand, the Commission should develop reasonable regulatory guidelines to deal with editorial advertisements. Petitioners should be allowed to reapply for advertising time: and, unless their presentations are found to be excludable under the Commission's guidelines, their applications should be accepted. Since the issues on which BEM and DNC seek to speak are current and changing, it is essential that regulations be developed speedily and that the affected broadcasters pass promptly upon petitioners' applications to buy time.

In the end, it may unsettle some of us to see an antiwar message or a political party message in the accustomed place of a soap or beer commercial. But we must not equate what is habitual with what is right—or what is constitutional. A society already so saturated with commercialism can well afford another outlet for speech on public issues. All that we may lose is some of our apathy. That is a small price to pay. For, as the Supreme Court has said, "a function of free speech under our system of government is to invite dispute. It may indeed best serve its high purpose when it induces a condition of unrest, creates dissatisfaction with conditions as they are, or even stirs people to anger." Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1, 4 (1949).

Reversed and remanded.

McGowan, Circuit Judge, dissenting: The majority do not hold that petitioner in No. 24,492 is entitled to have its proposed spot announcements carried by the intervenor-licensee there involved, or that the petitioner in No. 24,537 is assured of being able to buy time for its programs on public issues. What is held is that the Constitution commands that "some", but not all, editorial advertising be accepted; and the Commission is directed to embark upon rulemaking to determine how a licensee is to differentiate the "some" from the all.

The majority appear to believe that this assignment will not prove difficult. I am not so sure, particularly when I note that the only Commissioner who has perceived the same constitutional requirement as the majority responds to the practical requirement as the majority responds to the practical problems by suggesting that sales of a significant proportion of the total broadcast time be made on a first-come, first-served basis, accompanied by a possible suspension of the fairness doctrine. That approach does not seem to me a promising one in terms of the public's right to know.

The difficulties derive, of course, from the physical peculiarity which distinguishes radio and television communication from all other forms, namely, the limited number of frequencies and the impossibility of accommodating all who may wish to be heard over them. This, so the Supreme Court has said in Red Lion, makes it "idle to posit an unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of each individual to speak, write or publish." The majority, in recognition of this fact, do not purport to discern other than an "abridgeable" or "limited" First Amendment right to initiate paid editorial advertising. Petitioners themselves, it is said, may concievably never be able to insist that their particular advertising be accepted. That will depend upon the rules which the Commission propounds.

The Commission has, at the least, been set a task of heroic proportions, and one whose very complexities may undermine the premise upon which it is founded. The question is whether the Constitution requires that it be undertaken. I am not convinced that it does. It is presently the obligation of a licensee to advance the public's right to know by devoting a substantial amount of time to the presentation of controversial views on issues of public importance, striking a balance which is always subject to redress by reference to the fairness doctrine. Failure to do so puts continuation of the license at risk—a sanction of tremendous potency, and one which the Commission is under increasing pressure to employ.

This is the system which Congress has, wisely or not, provided as the alternative to public ownership and operation of radio and television communications facilities. This approach has neved been thought to be other than within the permissible limits of constitutional choice. Its existence provides a mechanism for implementation of the public's right to know which, by and large, has been effective. Indeed, the loudest voices in criticism of it complain that it has been working too well for the comfort of governmental policy makers in the areas of greatest current concern.

It is hardly the path of wisdom to scrap it for a system in which money alone determines what issues are to be aired, and in what format, even assuming, as is likely to be the case, that those issues, whatever they may prove to be, compare favorably with the intellectual content of the great bulk of commercial advertising. The responsibility for informing the public is now squarely on the licensee. That responsibility will only be diluted and obscured by requiring the licensee, against his own better judgment, to accept paid editorial advertising. I do not think the First Amendment requires that result, at least not within the context of a regulatory scheme which has made provision for the airing of controversial issues of public importance.

Of course it is true that licensees are currently free to accept paid editorial advertising, and some do, subject always to the limitations of the fairness doctrine. It may well be that a detailed inquiry and investigation by the Commission of this area, by formal rulemaking or otherwise, would be both useful and consonant with the Commission's continuing obligation to see to it that the public interest obligations of the licensees are being met in the most effective way. The Commission's currently announced purpose to undertake a comprehensive and wide-ranging review of the operation of the fairness doctrine might well include the subject of paid editorial advertising. But, believing as I do that the First Amendment exerts no compulsion to the contrary, I would not order the Commission to undertake that review in a constitutional straitjacket which dictates the result in advance.

UNITED STATES v. CALDWELL, AFFIDAVITS FILED IN SUPPORT OF CALDWELL PETITION TO QUASH SUBPOENA, DOCKET NO. 10426 (N.D. CAL. 1970)

AFFIDAVIT OF WALTER CRONKITE

STATE OF NEW YORK,
COUNTY OF NEW YORK, ss.:

WALTER CRONKITE, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. I am a News Correspondent with CBS News, a division of Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. My principal assignment since April 1962 has been Managing Editor of the "CBS Evening News with Walter Cronkite," a thirty minute television news program broadcast five nights each week by the CBS Network. In addition, I frequently serve as "anchor man" in the coverage of such special events as space missions and national political conventions and elections. Prior to joining CBS in 1950, I was a reporter-correspondent with United Press International for eleven years, covering the Western Front in World War II, the Nuremberg Trials and post-war Moscow.

2. My work involves the preparation, through reading and talking with news sources, of the considerable volume of material necessary for such extemporaneous broadcasts as political conventions, elections, and space missions, and for analytical broadcasts such as my daily radio program. It also involves participation in the determination of which stories should be covered on daily television news broadcasts and how they should be covered and participation in the selection of the news items to be broadcast and reading, correcting and, in some cases, rewriting those items. All of this work entails the exercise of editorial judgment based on an extensive background of information and ideas gathered from a wide variety of sources.

3. In doing my work, I (and those who assist me) depend constantly on information, ideas, leads and opinions received in confidence. Such material is essential in digging out newsworthy facts and, equally important, in assessing the importance and analyzing the significance of public events. Without such materials, I would be able to do little more than broadcast press releases and public statements.

4. The material that I obtain in privacy and on a confidential basis is given to me on that basis because my news sources have learned to trust me and can confide in me without fear of exposure. In nearly every case their position, perhaps their very job or career, would be in jeopardy if this were not the case. There are almost daily examples of this. For example: A member of the staff of a United States Senator advised me, far in advance of the announcement, that his employer did not plan to run for reelection. Another person in a similar position tipped me to his employer's intention to seek a higher office. An officer high in Pentatgon circles recently offered evidence of pressure high in the military command structure to get the President to cut back on his Viet Nam withdrawal commitments. A bartender told me of fraud in restaurant inspection in New York City. A scientist asserted that the Atomic Energy Commission's safety standards for atomic energy installations were not adequate. None of these persons would have volunteered this information if they thought they would be exposed as the source of the information. In short, I would be unable to obtain much of the material that is indispensable to my work if it were believed that people could not talk to me confidentially. I certainly could not work effectively if I had to say to each person with whom I talk that any information he gave me might be used against him.

5. On the basis of the foregoing and my experience as a news correspondent, it is my opinion that compelling news correspondents to testify before grand juries with respect to matters learned in the course of their work would largely destroy their utility as gatherers and analysts of news. Furthermore, once it is established and believed that news correspondents are to be utilized in grand jury investigations, they will be of precious little value to such investigations because they will no longer have access to information that grand juries might want.

AFFIDAVIT OF ERIC SEVAREID

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss.:

ERIC SEVAREID, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. I am National Correspondent for CBS News, a division of Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. I am stationed in Washington, D.C. Over the last thirty years I have worked as a war correspondent, radio news broadcaster and television commentator for CBS, as well as a newspaper reporter and editor for the Paris Herald and the United Press.

2. I am engaged chiefly in broadcast commentary, as distinguished from factual news reporting. In the course of this work which is of a highly personal nature, I regularly talk with government officials, former officials, military people and a wide spectrum of others who possess special information or expertise on public issues.

3. A great deal of this talk is of the "off the record" or "not for attribution" kind. It is for my own information. Many people feel free to discuss sensitive matters with me in the knowledge that I can use it with no necessity of attributing it to anyone. This relationship has always been particularly the case for columnists or commentators.

4. Should a widespread impression develop that my information or notes on these conversations is subject to claim by government investigators, this traditional relationship, essential to my kind of work, would be most seriously jeopardized. I would be less well informed, myself, and of less use to the general public as an interpretor or analyst of public affairs.

AFFIDAVIT OF MIKE WALLACE

STATE OF NEW YORK,
County of New York, ss:

MIKE WALLACE, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. I am a staff correspondent for CBS News, a division of Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. I have been employed in that capacity since 1963. Prior to 1963, over a period of approximately 20 years, I worked as a news reporter and commentator for the Chicago Sun, The Chicago Sun-Times, Station WMAQ in Chicago, for various television and radio news organizations in New York and as a columnist for the New York Post.

2. My chief assignment at present is to the CBS News television "magazine" program "60 Minutes." That assignment has involved coverage of politics, civil rights, the defense industry and other subjects of national interest as well as travel to South Vietnam, Israel, Egypt, Nigeria, Northern Ireland, and other countries. I have participated in various news special and CBS Reports, including "Marijuana" (1968), "The Homosexuals" (1967), and "Black Power—White Backlash" (1966).

3. In my experience in investigative news gathering the ability to establish and maintain the confidence of people who may be willing to suggest leads and divulge facts and background information to me has been essential. If such people believed that I might, voluntarily or involuntarily, betray their trust by disclosing my sources or their private communications to me, my usefulness as a reporter would be seriously diminished.

4. The reasons informants want their communications kept confidential are many and various: fear of incurring the wrath of a superior, fear of losing a job, fear of losing a contract and unwillingness to submit to the censure of colleagues for the expression of unpopular or unorthodox views. People in politics are frequently unwilling to show their hand in matters they deem newsworthy but sensitive. Government agencies, including the State Department and the Defense Department, frequently supply background information, public attribution or publication of which might jeopardize the careers of the officials involved as well as the foreign policies and programs of the United States.

5. A few examples will illustrate the critical role played by confidential sources in the development of news stories on matters of great public importance.

(a) I recently participated in the preparation of a report for "60 Minutes" relating to the cost overrun on the Mark-48 Torpedo. Some of the most important and revealing information that we obtained came in confidence from subcontractors, suppliers and men employed by Government agencies. Without that information we could not have constructed the story of how a torpedo project originally scheduled to cost $680,000,000 had risen to a projected $4,000,000,000. Thus, data from confidential sources enabled us to reveal a case of monumental mismanagement, inefficiency and waste.

(b) Another recent broadcast included a report on the production of the motion picture "Tora, Tora, Tora," the story of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. The filming of that picture involved the use of large numbers of ships, airplanes and personnel—all supplied by the United States Navy at great cost. In preparing my report I obtained a list of ten particularly embarrassing questions which certain officials within the Defense Department believed the Navy should have been prepared to answer satisfactorily before permitting the use without charge of its facilities and equipment by the movie's producer. Those questions, which could not have been published without a breach of confidence, were nonetheless of great value in interviewing the officials responsible for that decision. The interviews in turn were critical in developing a report on the use of public property and funds for private purposes—a story which resulted in a congressional investigation and remedial action by the Naval Department.

(c) As indicated above, the State Department and other departments and agencies of the government frequently conduct background conferences at which information and opinions are presented, but not for publication. Frequently, such views are in conflict with present public positions or policies of the government. Access to such information, however, provides the reporter with the ability to interpret information from other sources, anticipate changes of policy and analyze developments. My associates and I have also received background information from sources in the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Central Intelligence Agency, the General Accounting Office and the staffs of the chairmen of various congressional committees. Much of that information has been important to the development of reports that we have broadcast or which are in preparation.

(d) In the course of my assignment to cover Richard M. Nixon in the early stages of the 1968 campaign, I was present at non-public conversations and conferences and was able to talk informally with the candidate and some of his advisers, including the present Attorney General. Although it was seldom explicitly stated, it was understood that some of what was said on those occasions was not for publication. Because of the informality of such discussions the language used was more casual than the candidate would use in public. Moreover, ideas were discussed which were tentative and would later be refined or rejected. Had there been any thought at the time that I could be compelled to divulge a full report of some of those meetings, my presence would never have been permitted. As it was, I was able in the course of those sessions to acquire an understanding of the candidate which contributed significantly to my coverage of the campaign and, perhaps more important, an understanding of the President which has been invaluable in attempting to assess and analyze the present Administration.

6. In each of the foregoing instances, I was able to do my work because people felt assured that their confidences would be respected. If I were now forced to reveal such confidential information, I could never again count on the cooperation of those people or anyone else in developing similar material in the future. In my opinion the public would be the loser in the long run.

AFFIDAVIT OF DAN RATHER

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss.:

DAN RATHER, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. I am White House Correspondent for CBS News, a division of Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. I have been a reporter for newspapers, wire services, local radio and television stations, and broadcast networks for more than 20 years. In addition to serving as White House Correspondent, I have been news director of KTRH in Houston, Texas, director of news and public affairs at Station

KHOU-TV in Houston, Texas, and chief of CBS News bureaus in Dallas, Texas, New Orleans, Louisiana, London, England and Saigon, South Viet Nam. My assignments have included city halls, county court houses, state legislatures and police stations in this country and wars, natural disasters and politics, both at home and overseas. I reported on the riots accompanying James Meredith's enrollment at the University of Mississippi in 1962, civil rights demonstrations in Birmingham, Alabama, the integration of the University of Alabama and the assassination of President Kennedy in 1963, President Johnson's Asian tour in 1966, the assassination and funeral of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Democratic and Republican national conventions in 1968. I have also worked as a reporter on various in-depth CBS Reports, including "The Legacy of the Thresher" in 1964, "Abortion and the Law" in 1965 and "The Warren Report" in 1967.

2. My work, and that of reporters generally, requires more than merely assembling facts. A reporter can know all the facts and still not know the truth. In order to understand the facts, reporters must constantly appraise the accuracy and meaning of words and the significance of deeds. In that effort, reporters require a background of confidential judgments and observations obtainable only in privacy and in trust.

3. Furthermore, even the bare facts themselves are frequently obtainable only through confidence. For example, in the mid-1950's certain police officers of Houston, Texas, were stealing narcotics from arrested suspects and selling the narcotics for large amounts of money. The facts came out because honest police officers discussed them in confidence with a reporter who had an impeccable reputation for never revealing confidential sources. A great many other examples of the importance of confidential communications in the work of the news media could be cited; they are daily fare.

4. The fear that confidential discussions may be divulged, as a result of grand jury subpoenas or otherwise, would curtail a reporter's ability to discover and analyze the news. This is not mere speculation on my part. In recent weeks, a long-time friend and news source, who has dealt in confidence with me for more than a dozen years, has declined to do so. He has, on many occasions in the past, been responsible for truths, otherwise unobtainable, appearing in my reporting on civil rights, government and politics. This decent, honest citizen, who cares deeply about his country, has now told me that he fears that pressure from the Government, enforced by the courts, may lead to violations of confidence, and he is therefore unwilling to continue to communicate with me on the basis of trust which formerly existed between us. This incident is representative of the loss that reporters and those who depend upon them for truth will suffer if reporters can be forced to disclose confidential communications and private sources. The very possibility of such forced disclosure is, in my experience, sufficient to foreclose important channels of communication.

AFFIDAVIT OF MARVIN KALB

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss.;

MARVIN KALB, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. I am Diplomatic Correspondent for CBS News, a division of Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. I have held that post since February 1963. I have worked for CBS News since 1957 in various capacities, including three years as CBS News Moscow Bureau Chief, and have covered stories in Southeast Asia and eastern and western Europe. Prior to 1957 I served for two years as Press Attache to the United States Embassy in Moscow.

2. In the course of reporting on diplomatic affairs, I depend extensively on information which comes to me in confidence from sources whose anonymity must be maintained. Diplomacy is conducted as a private business. In my experience, diplomats detest publicity. Recently, one foreign ambassador slipped out of the garage exit of the State Department after a meeting with Secretary of State Rogers just to avoid the press and, thus, any public comment on his meeting. The information about that meeting, and many others, has to come from private talks with American and foreign officials, not one of whom would allow himself to be quoted or in any way identified with the news report.

3. Privacy and discretion are the very essence of my work as a reporter. Most of the information from which stories of diplomatic developments emerge comes from private talks. Secrecy, privacy, off-the-record, background, deep background—these are the words which describe the kind of work involved in the reporting of diplomatic nuance and detail and the building of a pattern which ultimately emerges as a story.

4. If my sources were to learn that their private talks with me could become public, or could be subjected to outside scrutiny by court order, they would stop talking to me, and the job of diplomatic reporting could not be done.

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

Pursuant to the written consent of all parties, The Washington Post Company and Newsweek, Inc. submit this brief as amici curiae in support of respondent Earl Caldwell ("Caldwell").

This brief is directed to the central issue on this appeal, namely, the extent to which the First Amendment affords to newsmen a privilege to withhold information obtained in the course of their professional newsgathering activities.

INTEREST OF THE AMICI

The Washington Post Company ("The Washington Post") is a Delaware corporation which publishes a major newspaper in Washington, D.C. The Washington Post also has interests in other media of mass communication, including radio and television stations. One of its wholly-owned subsidiaries, Newsweek, Inc. ("Newsweek"), publishes the weekly news magazine, NEWSWEEK.

Almost two years ago, prosecutors throughout the country, both federal and state, began to issue subpoenas to newsmen on an almost routine basis for the purpose of requiring the disclosure of information acquired by them in the course of their newsgathering activities. After almost a year of unremitting controversy, the Attorney General of the United States finally issued Guidelines which were apparently intended to assure the media that, at the federal level, at least, the indiscriminate use of such subpoenas would be curtailed because of their "limiting effect on the exercise of First Amendment rights." Address by Attorney General Mitchell, American Bar Association's Annual Meeting, 39 U.S. L.W. 2110, 2111 (August 25, 1970).

Among those subjected to such subpoenas were The Washington Post and Newsweek. Although subsequent negotiations led to satisfactory accommodations. The Washington Post and Newsweek continue to be deeply concerned about the constitutional issues raised by the issuance of such subpoenas. The amici do not believe that vindication of the First Amendment rights which such subpoenas obviously imperil should repose in the unrestricted discretion of the Attorney General (as now provided by the Attorney General's Guidelines which, in any event, are not binding on the states), or be left to an ad hoc bargaining process between prosecutors and the media after subpoenas have been issued.

Because of the particular interest of the amici on this appeal, we do not here address ourselves in detail to the procedural question, whether Caldwell should have actually appeared before the grand jury to claim his First Amendment privilege. We note, however, that, since the scope of the proposed grand jury interrogation of Caldwell so clearly involves matters relating only to his professional activities and sources. Caldwell's appearance would constitute a mere formality insofar as the Government is concerned—albeit with a strikingly detrimental effect on his First Amendment rights. Indeed, this obvious fact was the cornerstone of the Ninth Circuit's holding that Caldwell need not appear before the grand jury at all.

The amici believe, and urge upon this Court, that the First Amendment grants to newsmen a constitutional privilege, absolute and unqualified, to refuse in all circumstances, without penalty, to divulge to anyone any information or source, confidential or otherwise, which they obtain in the course of their professional newsgathering activities.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Our courts have long recognized that the Constitution assigns to the press a unique and vital role in the functioning of our democracy. It is precisely because a free press is a precondition to the exercise of all our freedoms that the constitutional guarantee of a free press is so highly prized and so zealously protected and why rights of free speech and press are generally held to prevail over conflicting rights and interests.

It is obvious that the well-established First Amendment freedom to write, publish and disseminate the news is illusory if gathering the news is not also within the ambit of constitutional protection. It is equally obvious, and, indeed, conceded by the Government, that the issuance of subpoenas to newsmen can have a significant, adverse effect on their ability to obtain information and thus upon the exercise of their First Amendment rights.

The fundamental question on this appeal, therefore, is whether the production of compulsory testimony from newsmen is so important in our governmental scheme as to justify impairment of First Amendment freedoms. We respectfully submit that it is not. The production of compulsory testimony, though important, is by no means paramount. Thus, our courts have often protected, at the expense of compulsory testimony, relationships and privileges which, though also important, are by no means as vital to the proper functioning of our government as the maintenance and preservation of a free press.

The need for some protection is obvious. The Attorney General has issued Guidelines which are intended to assure the media that the constitutional problem will at least be given advertent attention before the federal government acts. The courts below have also exhibited a sensitivity to these needs and have attempted to devise substantive tests, hedged by procedural safeguards, which assure and preserve First Amendment rights. We submit, however, that these steps are impractical and inadequate. These constitutional rights cannot be protected where their vindication is left to the discretion of a Government prosecutor, even one as highly placed as the Attorney General. And it has become increasingly clear that so-called qualified privileges, such as those devised below, are also insufficient to vindicate such rights.

We believe that nothing less than an unqualified, absolute First Amendment newsman's privilege is sufficient to preserve the First Amendment right of newsmen to gather and report the news without fear or favor.

ARGUMENT

The First Amendment requires an absolute and unqualified newsman's privilege.

Introduction

At the very outset, we endorse the holdings of the courts below insofar as they seek to assure to newsmen, on First Amendment grounds, the right to engage in their professional activities without the fear of being forced, on pain of contempt, to disclose information obtained in the course of such activities.[1]

The courts below held, however, that the privilege which they themselves had fashioned could be defeated on a showing, in the words of the district court, of a "compelling and overriding national interest which cannot be alternatively served" (Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358, 360 (N. D. Cal.), rev'd nom. Caldwell v. United States, 434 F. 2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970)), or, as restated the Ninth Circuit with reference to attendance, where the Government has de onstrated "a compelling need for the witness' presence. . . ." 434 F. 2d at 1089.

We submit that these qualifications emasculate the constitutional protection that any limitation on the right of newsmen to keep in confidence informati obtained in the course of their newsgathering activities will have a serious and detrimental effect on First Amendment freedoms. Indeed, as we shall hereafter demonstrate, our contentions are validated by the various judicial proceedings arising out of the investigation here involved.

[1] The right of newsmen to gather the news without fear of compelled disclosure, as stated, has commended itself to a number of courts which have considered the proble since Judge Zirpoli first rendered his decision. People v. Dohrn, Crim. No. 69–3808 (Il Cook County Ct. May 20, 1970); Illinois v. Tomashevsky, Crim. No. 69–3358–59 (Il Cook County Ct. April 7, 1970); Air Transport Ass'n v. Professional Air Traffic C trollers Organization, Nos. 70-C-400, 410 (E. D. N. Y.) Tr. Such recognition has not, however, been uniform, as witness the decisions Branzburg v. Meigs (not officially reported) (Ky. 1971); Branzburg v. Pound, — K —, 461 S.W. 2d 345 (1971), appeal docketed sub nom. Branzburg v. Hayes (No. 70- October Term 1971) and In the Matter of Pappas, — Mass. —, 266 N.E. 2d 297 (197 appeal docketed, (No. 70–94, October Term 1971).

A. The Role of the First Amendment

The First Amendment to the Constitution reads in pertinent part:

> "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. . . ."

The basic freedoms thus protected have long held a preferred position in our hierarchy of legal values. See, e.g., Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 529–32; Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 115. This Court has recognized many times that freedom of speech and press is the very cornerstone of free government by free men. See, e.g., Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501, 509; Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 161; De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 364.

It is well settled that the First Amendment proscribes not only legislative action inconsistent with its command, but also action by the federal executive and judiciary, including, specifically, the issuance of subpoenas in connection with federal investigations and proceedings. Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 187–88.[2]

The Government's suggestion (Br. at 15)[3] that the Constitution protects the freedom to write, publish and disseminate the news, but that all these rights are illusory because the right to gather the news is not similarly protected, borders on the frivolous. Obviously, the First Amendment must protect, not only the dissemination of news, but all activities incidental thereto, including, specifically, the gathering of news. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 482–83; Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301, 308 (Brennan, J., concurring); Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545, 548 (2d Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910; Associated Press v. KVOS, Inc., 80 F. 2d 575, 581 (9th Cir. 1935), rev'd on jurisdictional grounds, 299 U.S. 269; Providence Journal Co. v. McCoy, 94 F. Supp. 186, 195–96 (D. R. I. 1950), aff'd on narrower grounds, 190 F. 2d 760 (1st Cir. 1951), cert. denied, 342 U.S. 894. See also Note, Reporters and Their Sources: The Constitutional Right to a Confidential Relationship, 80 YALE L. J. 317, 326–9 (1970), and authorities there cited.

The fact that the Government has chosen to make this argument in the face of the Attorney General's own Guidelines, which recognize that "compulsory process in some circumstances may have a limiting effect on the exercise of First Amendment rights," is reason enough for not relegating the protection of such highly prized rights to the unfettered discretion of the Executive.[4] See Br. at 47 n. 42.

In light of the controlling importance of the First Amendment to the proper function of our governmental system, we submit, at the outset of this discussion, that the appropriate inquiry is not (as has been sometimes suggested) whether the right of a newsman to gather the news is of sufficient importance to overcome the general duty of all persons to give compulsory testimony. It is, instead, whether the need for compulsory testimony is so compelling in our scale of legal values as to justify an intrusion on the First Amendment right of a newsman to gather news—an intrusion so serious and substantial that it would, as a practical matter, seriously impair or even destroy the ability of the news media to fulfill the unique role assigned to them in the functioning of our democratic society.

B. The Constitution Assigns to the Press a Unique and Vital Role in the Functioning of our Democracy.

It has long been recognized that the news media play a uniquely vital role in the proper functioning of our system of government. Indeed, the media are in a very real sense the ombudsmen of our constitutional system, and have long been recognized as such. This special role and function of the free press is no evolutionary accident: it is part and parcel of the grand design conceived by our Founding Fathers. In Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 716–18, Chief Justice Hughes, in reviewing the genesis of the First Amendment, quoted from a letter sent by the Continental Congress (October 26, 1774) to the Inhabitants of Quebec (p. 717):

---

[2] The mandate of the First Amendment applies equally to all branches of state government by virtue of the due process provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment. See, e.g., New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (state court); N.A.A.C.P. v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (state executive); Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234 (state legislature). Thus, whatever rule is developed here should apply equally to Branzburg and Pappas, supra, note p. 5.

[3] The citation "Br." refers to the Brief on the Merits for the Government in this case.

[4] Equally frivolous is the Government's suggestion (Br. at 11–12) that no First Amendment issue is presented by this appeal and that the only issue is whether Caldwell should be required to appear before a grand jury. It is obvious from the opinion of the Court of Appeals that the procedural ruling which the Government here attacks is based exclusively on the premise that Caldwell had a First Amendment right which required protection.

> " 'The last right we shall mention, regards the freedom of the press. The importance of this consists, besides the advancement of truth, science, morality, and arts in general, in its diffusion of liberal sentiments on the administration of Government, its ready communication of thoughts between subjects, and its consequential promotion of union among them, whereby oppressive officers are shamed or intimidated, into more honourable and just modes of conducting affairs.' "

The Chief Justice then quoted with approval James Madison,[5] whom the Chief Justice characterized as the leading spirit in the formulation of the First Amendment. Madison, in describing the reasons why our state constitutions included guarantees of freedom of the press, said (p. 718):

> " 'In every State, probably, in the Union, the press has exerted a freedom in canvassing the merits and measures of public men of every description which has not been confined to the strict limits of the common law. On this footing the freedom of the press has stood; on this footing it yet stands. . . . Some degree of abuse is inseparable from the proper use of everything, and in no instance is this more true than in that of the press. It has accordingly been decided by the practice of the States, that it is better to leave a few of its noxious branches to their luxuriant growth, than, by pruning them away, to injure the vigour of those yielding the proper fruits. And can the wisdom of this policy be doubted by any who reflect that to the press alone, chequered as it is with abuses, the world is indebted for all the triumphs which have been gained by reason and humanity over error and oppression; who reflect that to the same beneficient source the United States owe much of the lights which conducted them to the ranks of a free and independent nation. . . .' "

In Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, this Court described the role of our press in the following terms (p. 250):

> "The newspapers, magazines and other journals of the country, it is safe to say, have shed and continued to shed, more light on the public and business affairs of the nation than any other instrumentality of publicity; and since informed public opinion is the most potent of all restraints upon misgovernment, the suppression or abridgement of the publicity afforded by a free press cannot be regarded otherwise than with grave concern."

And further (Id.):

> "A free press stands as one of the great interpreters between the government and the people. To allow it to be fettered is to fetter ourselves."

In Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, this Court, describing the function of the press in our governmental system, made the following pertinent observation (p. 20):

> "[The First] Amendment rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public, that a free press is a condition of a free society."

In Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367, Mr. Justice Murphy, concurring, said (p. 383):

> "A free press lies at the heart of our democracy and its preservation is essential to the survival of liberty. Any inroad made upon the constitutional protection of a free press tends to undermine the freedom of all men to print and to read the truth."

More recently, in Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532, this Court noted (p. 539):

> "The free press has been a mighty catalyst in awakening public interest in government affairs, exposing corruption among public officers and employees and generally informing the citizenry of public events and occurrences, including court proceedings."

As noted in Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 219:

> "The Constitution specifically selected the press, which includes not only newspapers, books, and magazines, but also humble leaflets and circulars, see Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, to play an important role in the discussion of public affairs. Thus the press serves and was designed to serve as a power> ful antidote to any abuses of power by governmental officials and as a constitutionally chosen means for keeping officials elected by the people responsible to all the people whom they were selected to serve. Suppression of the right of the press to praise or criticize governmental agents and to clamor and contend for or against change, which is all that this editorial did, muzzles one of the very agencies the Framers of our Constitution thoughtfully and deliberately selected to improve our society and keep it free."

[5] Report on the Virginia Resolutions, MADISON'S WORKS, vol. iv, 544.

Most recently in New York Times Co. v. United States, 91 S. Ct. 2140, Mr. Justice Black said (p. 2143):

> "In the First Amendment the Founding Fathers gave the free press the protection it must have to fulfill its essential role in our democracy. The press was to serve the governed, not the governors. The Government's power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the Government. The press was protected so that it could bare the secrets of government and inform the people. Only a free and unrestrained press can effectively expose deception in government."

The unique role which the press is called upon to play in our system of government has been acknowledged, not only by the courts, but by other knowledgeable observers of our legal and constitutional system. See generally H. Bruckner, Freedom of Information (1949); W. Chenery, Freedom of the Press (1955); P. Freund, The Supreme Court of the United States, ch. III (1961); W. Lippman, Liberty and the News (1920); A. Meiklejohn, Free Speech and its Relation to Self-Government (1948); C. Swisher, The Growth of Constitutional Power in the United States, ch. VII (2d ed. 1963); Meiklejohn, The First Amendment is Absolute, 1961 Supreme Court Review 245. A. Meiklejohn.

The vital role of a free press to a free society is so well-recognized that further proliferation of authority is unnecessary. As Mr. Justice Brennan observed in Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 389:

> "Those guarantees are not for the benefit of the press so much as for the benefit of all of us."

C. Where First Amendment Rights Conflict with Other Rights and Interests, First Amendment Rights Normally Prevail.

We are cognizant of the holdings of this Court to the effect that, in some circumstances, First Amendment rights must give way to other rights where the preservation of our society or its orderly functioning is vitally at stake; but this Court has also made clear that such rights give way only in the most limited, extraordinary circumstances.

As stated in Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 529–30:

> "The case confronts us again with the duty our system places on this Court to say where the individual's freedom ends and the State's power begins. Choice on that border, now as always delicate, is perhaps more so where the usual presumption supporting legislation is balanced by the preferred place given in our scheme to the great, the indispensable democratic freedoms secured by the First Amendment. Cf. Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147; Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296; Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158. That priority gives these liberties a sanctity and a sanction not permitting dubious intrusions."

And further (p. 530):

> ". . . whatever occasion would restrain orderly discussion and persuasion, at appropriate time and place, must have clear support in public danger, actual or impending. Only the gravest abuses, indangering paramount interests, give occasion for permissible limitation."

In Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, Mr. Justice Stewart made the following comments (pp. 522–24):

> "Like freedom of speech and a free press, the right of peaceable assembly was considered by the Framers of our Constitution to lie at the foundation of a government based upon the consent of an informed citizenry—a government dedicated to the establishment of justice and the preservation of liberty. U.S. Const., Amend. I.

* * * * * * *

> "Where there is a significant encroachment upon personal liberty, the State may prevail only upon showing a subordinating interest which is compelling. N.A.A.C.P. v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449. See also Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11; Schneider v. State; 308 U.S. 147; Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, 574; Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319, U.S. 105; Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158; Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77."

Ordinarily, where First Amendment rights conflict with rights, powers, and privileges of the Government in general, or with other non-First Amendment rights, the rights protected by the First Amendment prevail.

In Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, this Court struck down a city ordinance which required the licensing of all persons soliciting orders for merchandise within the city because that ordinance had been applied to the sale of religious books and pamphlets by Jehovah's Witnesses. In so holding, Mr. Justice Douglas said (p. 115):

> "The fact that the ordinance is 'nondiscriminatory' is immaterial. The protection afforded by the First Amendment is not to restricted. A license tax certainly does not acquire constitutional validity because it classifies the privileges protected by the First Amendment along with the wares and merchandise of hucksters and peddlers and treats them all alike. Such equality in treatment does not save the ordinance. Freedom of press, freedom of speech, freedom of religion are in a preferred position."

As stated in Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 263:

> "[T]he First Amendment does not speak equivocally. It prohibits any law 'abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press.' It must be taken as a command of the broadest scope that explicit language, read in the context of a liberty-loving society, will allow."

And further (p. 265):

> ". . . the only conclusion supported by history is that the unqualified prohibitions laid down by the framers were intended to give to liberty of the press, as to the other liberties, the broadest scope that could be countenanced in an orderly society."

These principles were most recently applied in New York Times Co. v. United States and United States v. Washington Post Co., 91 S. Ct. 2140.[6]

D. The Compulsory Production of Testimony by Newsmen Will Have a Substantial, Adverse Impact on the First Amendment Right to Gather the News

As we have observed, gathering the news is as much protected by the First Amendment as is its dissemination. It is obvious that newsgathering depends in large part upon information given to reporters in confidence, as the Government now concedes.[7] It is equally obvious that, if a newsman is compelled to testify as to his sources or other confidential matters, the inevitable consequence must be a deleterious effect, not only on his own newsgathering activities, but on newsgathering activities, generally. This self-evident fact plainly appears from the affidavits of newsmen which have been submitted in this proceeding, and has also been accorded gruding recognition in the Attorney General's Guidelines. As noted by the the Government in Branzburg and Pappas (Am. Br. at 6):

> "It has, of course, long been recognized that many newsworthy stories would never have reached the public if the sources had been unable to rely on anonymity."

But we need not rely merely on the newsmen's affidavits or the Government's concessions: The courts themselves—even those which have rejected a First Amendment newsman's privilege—have taken judicial notice of the fact that the compulsory testimony of newsmen will "dry up" their sources of information. As the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania acknowledged in In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 41, 193 A. 2d 181, 185 (1963):

> "We would be unrealistic if we did not take judicial notice of another matter of wide public knowledge and great importance, namely, that important information, tips and leads will dry up and the public will often be

---

[6] Any suggestion that the position of the media in those cases is inconsistent with their position here is, we believe, ill-founded. In those cases, as in this, the position urged by the media was designed to insure public access to the free flow of information. Both positions rest squarely on the furtherance of the purposes of First Amendment freedoms.

[7] The Government noted in its Brief as amicus curiae in Branzburg and Pappas:

> "Since the early lays of the Republic, the newsgathering process has depended in large part on information given to reporters in confidence." (Am. Br. at 4).
> * * * * * * *
> "As revealed by a 1968 study of all major newspapers in the United States, an 'absolutely staggering' number of news stories are developed from information given to reporters in confidence." (Am. Br. at 7).

> deprived of the knowledge of dereliction of public duty, bribery, corruption, conspiracy and other crimes committed or possibly committed by public officials or by powerful individuals or organizations, unless newsmen are able to fully and completely protect the sources of their information. It is vitally important that this public shield against governmental inefficiency, corruption and crime be preserved against piercing and erosion.
> "The District Attorney points out that such a construction of 'non-disclosure of source' will enable newsmen to conceal or cover up crimes. This is correct. However, we are convinced that the public welfare will be benefitted more extensively and to a far greater degree by protection of all sources of disclosure of crime, conspiracy and corruption than it would be by the occasional disclosure of the sources of newspaper information concerning a crime!" (footnotes omitted) (emphasis in original text).

In Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545, 548 (2d Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910, Mr. Justice Stewart, then sitting as a Circuit Judge, said:

> "As to the Constitutional issue, we accept at the outset the hypothesis that compulsory disclosure of a journalist's confidential sources of information may entail an abridgement of press freedom by imposing some limitation upon the availability of news." (footnote omitted).

In In re Goodfader's Appeal, 45 Hawaii 317, 327–28, 367 P. 2d 472, 479 (1961), the Supreme Court of Hawaii acknowledged:

> "Appellant contends that the freedom to gather news is inseparable from the freedom to print news, that both are equally indispensable to a free press and therefore a restraint on gathering news (such as would occur in the absence of a reporter's ability to assure the confidentiality of his news sources) is, in itself, an infringement of the free press clause of the First Amendment. We readily perceive the disadvantages to a news reporter where his desire to remain silent under a pledge of confidentiality is not accommodated. . . ."

This Court has repeatedly emphasized, in a variety of contexts, the value of anonymity in the collection and dissemination of information. Conversely, this Court has also recognized that identification of the source of information or ideas has served to stifle First Amendment freedoms because of fear of retaliation or punishment. See, e.g., Gibson v. Florida Legislative Comm., 372 U.S. 539; Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60, 64–65; Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516; N. A. A. C. P. v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449. Similarly, the Court has recognized an informer's privilege to remain anonymous on the ground that the government could thus obtain confidential information otherwise unavailable to it. See, e.g., McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300; Scher v. United States, 305 U.S. 251.

Pertinent, here, are the comments of James Hagerty, formerly Press Secretary to President Eisenhower and presently a corporate officer of the American Boadcasting Company, who said at a Symposium on the very day this case was argued before Judge Zirpoli:

> "At the present time there has been a considerable amount of controversy. I suppose it bubbled to the front with two speeches by the Vice President. Speaking for my industry, although I may be a minority voice in my industry, I think we overreacted like hell. This was nothing, again, new. One thing, however, that I personally have considerable questions on is the attempt to use the power of subpoena by the Attorney General to undermine the news sources of the newsmen.
> "If you start to destroy the confidence of news reporters by opening their notes and the traditional standards of confidence between a reporter and his sources to subpoena, then you are going to destroy the freedom of the press, indeed, the integrity of the press. You are going to destroy the information that you as the public get."[8]

In view of the obvious fact that compulsory disclosure jeopardizes the ability of the press to gather news, the question naturally presents itself: Why has the free flow of news not dried up long before now? The answer, we submit, is relatively simple: Until recently, government prosecutors, government officials and others in a position to compel testimony have for the most part recognized, at least de facto, the privilege so long and consistently asserted by newsmen;[9]

---

[8] Mr. Hagerty's comments are reported in R. HOXIE, THE WHITE HOUSE: ORGANIZATION AND OPERATIONS 20 (1971).

[9] See, e.g., Governor Thomas E. Dewey's statement as reported in 35 NEB. L. REV. 562 n. 4 (1956):

> "The governor has had ten years experience as a prosecutor of crime. In all experience, he has never found it necessary or desirable to attempt to com and in those instances where an interrogator has sought to breach the privilege, the newsman has almost invariably accepted fine or imprisonment rather than disclose his sources or other confidential information—a fact of which the public has long been aware.[10]

E. The Compelling Need for a Newsman's Privilege is Entitled to Greater Constitutional Protection than the Need for Compulsory Testimony, a Need which is Far from Supreme in our Scale of Values.

Inasmuch as a free press is essential to the fulfillment of what was described in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 270 as ". . . a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open . . ." any application of governmental power which has, or may have, the effect of curtailing the newsgathering activities of the press must be "subject to the closest scrutiny." N. A. A. C. P. v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449, 461. Such scrutiny is particularly apposite where, as here, the subject is the application of the power of compulsory process and the criminal sanctions which penalize non-compliance. As was said in Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U. S. 234, 245:

> "It is particularly important that the exercise of the power of compulsory process be carefully circumscribed when the investigative process tends to impinge upon such highly sensitive areas as freedom of speech or press, freedom of political association, and freedom of communication of ideas . . ."

More specifically, we inquire whether, under our system of government, the compulsory disclosure of relevant evidence is of such paramount importance as would justify substantial impingement upon the freedom of the press to gather and disseminate the news. We respectfully submit that it is not; that the preservation of an institution as important to our form of government as a free press should not and must not depend upon the willingness of newsmen to go to jail rather than violate their covenants of confidence. Rather, the responsibility for preserving a freely functioning press rests with our courts, as the ultimate guardians of our constitutional liberties.

In arriving at the conclusion that compulsory testimony, important though it is, must be subordinate to freedom of the press, we rely upon the value judgments expressed in statutes and court decisions, both federal and state, which have held, in a wide variety of circumstances, that the importance of other protectible interests transcends that of any right to compel testimony.

We are all familiar with a vast variety of so-called privileges, recognized by federal or state law or both, which deprive our courts of testimony which is relevant, materials, and in some instances decisive, and are thus accorded an importance greater than that of the need of our courts and other institutions to compel testimony. These privileges include the attorney-client privilege, the doctor-patient privilege, the priest-penitent privilege, the husband-wife privilege, the accountant-client privilege, and, indeed, such esoteric statutory privileges as the "registered psychologist-client" and "certified social worker-client" privileges. See, e.g., N.Y. C.P.L.R. §§ 4507–08 (McKinney Supp. 1970).

The attorney-client privilege can, perhaps, be equated in importance with the right to compel testimony, since both relate to, and are designed to promote, the orderly function of the judicial system; and the priest-penitent privilege may, perhaps, be justified as protecting freedom of religion. But the physician-patient privilege, the husband-wife privilege, the accountant-client privilege and the registered psychologist and certified social worker privileges, though designed to protect relationships of a personal nature to which the states ascribe social imnewspaperman to reveal the source of his information. He has a deep understanding of problems of the men of the press and the need to protect their sources of information. See also STATE OF NEW YORK, REPORT OF THE LAW REVISION COMMISSION FOR 1949 at 143-46 (1949), setting out statements from various Attorneys General and police chiefs in those jurisdictions having a reporter's privilege that the existence of that privilege has not interfered with law enforcement or the prosecution of criminals, and has, in fact, on occasion provided valuable assistance.

[10] The Government's two-pronged suggestion, in Branzburg and Pappas, that this Court should not now recognize a newsman's privilege because our courts have not until recently found it necessary to do so, and that, in any event, the creation of such privilege should be left to Congress and the legislatures of the fifty states, is fatuous. If these arguments had any validity, they would apply whenever this Court acts to protect constitutional rights in any area in which such rights have not theretofore been judicially recognized. But in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, for example, this Court did not abide legislative action when it overruled almost two hundred years of American libel law to erect a far-reaching constitutional principle for the purpose of protecting First Amendment rights, and this in the face of repeated dicta by this Court that libel was not within the ambit of constitutional protection.

portance, can hardly be deemed on a parity, as to objective, with the preservation of a free press, where the interest relates to the proper functioning of a free society. As noted in Note, Reporters and Their Sources: The Constitutional Right to a Confidential Relationship, 80 YALE L. J. 317, 343:

> "The newsman-informer relationship is different from that of other relationships whose confidentiality is protected by statute, such as the attorney-client and physician-patient relationships. In the case of other statutory privileges, the right of nondisclosure is granted to the person making the communication in order that he will be encouraged by strong assurances of confidentiality to seek such relationships which contribute to his personal well-being. The judgment is made that the interests of society will be served when individuals consult physicians and lawyers; the public interest is thus advanced by creating a zone of privacy that the individual can control. However, in the case of the reporter-informer relationship, society's interest is not in the welfare of the informant per se, but rather in creating conditions in which information possessed by news sources can reach public attention." (footnotes omitted) (emphasis added).[11]

Our reference to statutory privileges which to varying degrees impinge on the right to compel testimony would be incomplete without mention of the seventeen states—including California, where this case arose—which, by adopting newsmen's privilege statutes, have expressed the legislative judgment that, in their courts, at least, the protection of a newsman's relationship with his informants is more important than compulsory testimony and will not interfere unduly with judicial process.[12] This judgment has been followed by at least one federal court sitting in one of those states. Ex Parte Sparrow, 14 F. R. D. 351, 353 (N. D. Ala. 1953).[13]

Other privileges, created and recognized by our courts, are premised on the proposition that society's interest in the production of compulsory testimony is of less importance than various other interests deemed desirable to a society. The informer privilege, for example, places the interests of law enforcement ahead of explicit constitutional rights of confrontation and the disclosure of truth unless "essential" to the defense, and this in the face of an equally explicit right of a criminal defendant, under the Sixth Amendment, to compulsory process. See McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300; Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53; Sher v. United States, 305 U.S. 251.

This Court has long applied the rule which excludes relevant and material evidence obtained in the course of an illegal search and seizure, Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383, and has required the application of the exclusionary rule in federal and state courts alike. Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643. Here, also, we are prepared to forego often determinative evidence in order to protect a constitutional right deemed of greater social importance.

More recently, in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, this Court held that voluntary confessions to crimes were inadmissible where the suspect had not first been apprised of his right to counsel under the Sixth Amendment. Thus, this Court has required our trial courts to forego otherwise relevant and competent evidence in order to preserve and protect what this Court deems the paramount right of a criminal suspect to the advice of counsel, a right created under the Sixth Amendment.

This Court has also held that the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination must deprive grand juries, investigative bodies and the courts of testimony concerning criminal conduct from the person most knowledgeable about the matter under investigation because, under our system, the right of a criminal suspect to remain silent transcends in importance the production of compulsory testimony. Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 188; Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 66.

[11] Dean Abraham S. Goldstein of the Yale Law School developed the same point in an article advocating a newsman's privilege which was published in Newsmen and Their Confidential Sources, THE NEW REPUBLIC, March 21, 1970, at 13–15.

[13] Studies have substantiated the validity of this legislative judgment. See, e.g., Guest & Stanzler, The Constitutional Argument for Newsmen Concealing their Sources, 64 Nw. U. L. Rev. 18, 38 (1969).

In short, in a variety of contexts, this Court has repeatedly recognized that the production of evidence is less important than various rights, constitutional and otherwise, none of which surpass or even equal in importance the preservation of a free press.

Finally, there is the judgment of Congress, as evidenced by nearly a hundred federal statutes, that the compulsory disclosure of confidential communications must be limited or proscribed in order to facilitate the free flow to governmental agencies of information concerning various matters, most of which, though important, can in no sense be treated as vital to the preservation of our democratic society. As was observed in Note, Privacy and Efficient Government: Proposals for a National Data Center, 82 HARV. L. REV. 400, 409 n.46 (1968):

> "There are nearly 100 federal statutes which provide protection of this character for given disclosures related to personal life, see, e.g., 13 U.S.C. § 9(a) (1964) (census data); 38 U.S.C. § 3301 (1964) (Veterans' Administration records), or financial interests, see e.g., INT. REV. CODE OF 1954. § 6103(a) (tax returns); 15 U.S.C. § 46(f) (1964) (trade secrets and names of customers). H.R. REP. No. 1497, 89th Cong., 2d Sess. 10 (1966). Other data, not specifically restricted by statute, has been declared to be confidential and its circulation limited by regulations issued under the rule-making power of an agency. See, e.g., 32 C.F.R. §§ 1606.31–42, 1670.5–.8 (1968) (Selective Service records). Finally, some information is treated as confidential by an agency because it is received under an informal pledge of non-disclosure. Some 97% of all personal disclosures are given some measure of confidential protection. See STAFF OF SUBCOMM. ON ADMIN. PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE OF THE SENATE COMM. F. A Limited or So-called Qualified Privilege for Newsmen is Insufficient for First Amendment Purposes.

We are not unaware of the reluctance of bench and bar alike to expand recognized privileges at the expense of compulsory testimony. Nor are we unaware of arguments to the effect that, if a newsman's privilege is to be recognized at all, it should apply only in certain specified circumstances, although it is evident that there exists a disparity of opinion as to what those circumstances should be.

It has been suggested, for example, that the privilege should exist except as to information which goes "to the heart" of the inquiry, and which is unavailable or not readily accessible elsewhere. Others have suggested that any newsman's privilege be expressly inapplicable to information concerning future illegal conduct or confessions of the commission of serious crimes or communications related vitally to the national security. Still others have suggested that, if the privilege is to be judicially recognized at all, it should apply only to the identity of a newsman's confidential sources, or to information imparted to him under express promise of confidence, or to information which has been published, or, alternatively, only to information which has not been published.

Finally, we advert, of course, to the rulings below that the privilege applies only "until such time as a compelling and overriding national interest which cannot be alternatively served has been established to the satisfaction of the Court." 311 F. Supp. 358, 360.

All of these suggestions and tests have their merits and demerits, as well as a special appeal to those who are traditionally opposed to the creation of privileges against compulsory testimony, but who nevertheless recognize the merit of extending some protection to newsmen in order to facilitate a primary function of the free press.

There is, however, one underlying reason for rejecting all half-way measures: Nothing less than a full and unqualified privilege to newsmen, empowering them to decline to testify as to any information professionally obtained, will provide the certainty necessary to preserve and protect the newsgathering activities of the media.

Our reasons for conducing that nothing less will do are:

1. Any attempt to solve the problem on a case-by-case basis, where existence of the privilege is dependent upon an ad hoc assessment of such circumstances as the relevancy or importance of the newsman's information and its availability from other sources, must necessarily have a repressive effect upon the willingness of all informants to make disclosures to newsmen. An informant would have no way of determining, in advance, whether a particular piece of information went "to the heart" of any prospective judicial or legislative proceeding, or might become a matter of "compelling and overriding national interest," or whether such information, at the time of such proceeding, might be available through other sources. Thus, the mere possibility that a court or a legislative or administrative body may find, in a particular case, that the importance of the information it seeks outweighs the value of preserving a particular confidence must necessarily leave informants uncertain as to whether their confidences will in any instance be respected. Thus, in this First Amendment area, as in others, vagueness and uncertainty must inevitably have a chilling effect.

2. Any real attempt, in the context of a grand jury investigation, to determine whether a particular inquiry involves "compelling need" or a "matter of compelling and overriding national interest which cannot be alternatively served" will inevitably destroy the traditional secrecy of grand jury proceedings, with all the ills attendant upon that destruction. As the courts have so often noted, the secrecy of grand jury proceedings is preserved, not only to prevent the guilty from fleeing the jurisdiction, but also to prevent the visitation of publicity on those whom the grand jury conclude are innocent and determines, therefore, not to indict. If, as a prerequisite to obtaining testimony from a newsman, it becomes necessary to disclose the objectives of the investigation and the efforts which have been made to obtain the information from others, that secrecy will have irrevocably been breached, perhaps under circumstances which would endanger the reporter's very life. The absolute privilege we urge would eliminate any need to breach the traditional secrecy of grand jury proceedings, since the relevant inquiries would be limited to the status of the reporter and whether he obtained the information in his professional capacity.

3. Any rule which were to exclude from the privilege certain classes of communications, such as information related to future illegal conduct, would likewise result in a "drying up" of disclosures outside (and perhaps even within) the ambit of the privilege. While such information could obviously be of importance, either in the prevention of future crimes or in the detection and punishment of crimes already committed, the salient fact is that a partial disclosure, through publication, is better than no disclosure at all.[14]

4. There is also the risk that engrafting exceptions onto the privilege will breed yet further exceptions, so that, ultimately, even the limited value of a so-called qualified privilege could for all practical purposes become non-existent. It would be hazardous even for the legally sophisticated to predict, in many given instances, whether particular information, if disclosed, would be privileged as to content or source if the privilege were riddled with qualifications and exceptions; and to expect newsmen or their sources to make any such prediction would be less than realistic. Moreover, if no existing qualification were squarely in point, who could say that a particular case would not give rise to the creation of a new qualification or exception, and thus weaken further the foundation of the privilege?

5. In order to encourage sources to reveal to the press information of value to the common weal, any privilege granted the media must be as broad as possible, and simple enough for any one to understand. A privilege, the scope and applicability of which is determined on a case-by-case basis, or which is limited to certain classes of information, will not readily be comprehended or appreciated by laymen, and will surely lead informants to err on the side of silence.

6. Any privilege which applies only to confidential communications will inevitably prove uncertain or inadequate:

[14] By way of example, the Government asserts that the grand jury which issued the subpoena to Caldwell was investigating threats by David Hilliard on the life of President Nixon (Br. at 3-4). For all that appears, the publication of Caldwell's story may have been responsible for non-judicial steps taken by the Government to frustrate that very threat. We ask: Is it not more desirable to allow the free flow of even such information than, by the use of compulsory process, to dry it up, so that responsible officials may no longer get advance warning of such matters?

(a) Much information is revealed under circumstances where the element of confidentiality, though present, is elusive of proof in a court of law. The record here, for example, shows that Black Panther sources gave information to Caldwell on only an unspoken, nebulous understanding that he would sense what was nonconfidential and intended for publication and what was not. And in Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545, 547 n.3 (2d Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910, the court noted with respect to the claim of confidentiality there asserted:

> "3. This confidentiality was apparently not explicit: 'Q. Did this network executive ask you to withhold giving his name? A. No, he did not. It is just that having worked in the business so long, in cases like this you don't mention the man's name.'"

(b) In the course of their duties, reporters are frequently in a position to obtain information under circumstances not actually involving assurances of confidence. Yet to require the reporter to testify with respect to such information may well diminish or destroy his effectiveness. It is commonplace, for example, for a reporter, photographer or TV cameraman to operate amidst demonstrations, race riots, campus confrontations, workers' strikes and similar events which coulld later give rise to criminal or civil inquiry. If the participants become convinced that the media representatives are, albeit unwillingly, "spies for the establishment" or FBI or police informants or may some day be called as witnesses against them in court proceedings, the net result may be—and has been—broken cameras, if not broken heads.[15]

7. The suggestion that the privilege attach only to published information is also inadequate. Obviously, the reporter himself, much less his informant, has no way of knowing, at the time of disclosure, whether the information about to be disclosed will thereafter be published. The reporter receiving information may not submit it for publication because his subsequent investigation convinces him that there is no substance to what he has been told. The reporter's employer may decide for legal or editorial reasons that portions of a story must be excised or that the story should be "killed." Other reasons which might lead a newspaper or magazine to decline to publish information submitted for publication could be founded in patriotism or taste or lack of space or news value or a variety of other reasons unnecessary to enumerate.

8. A privilege limited to non-published information is also inadequate, since it, too, would be subject to the same element of uncertainty.

* * * * * * *

It is for reasons such as these that a privilege developed on a case-by-case or situation-by-situation basis will not do; why the Government's suggestion (Br. at 16–34) that any constitutional problem has here been obviated by Judge Zirpoli's protective order is unsound; why anything less than complete and unqualified assurances of confidentiality in all circumstances will inevitably "dry up" a reporter's sources of information and thus impinge upon freedom of the press and the public's "right to know."

It is precisely because of considerations analogous to those enumerated above that this Court has in recent years tended to abandon attempts to apply on a case-by-case basis statutes which would likely impinge upon constitutionally protected areas. Instead, in recognition of the "chilling effect" the very existence of such a statute could have upon constitutionally protected activities, this Court has held such statutes unconstitutional in toto, even where the application of the statute to the particular case would not be constitutionally invalid. See Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444; United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258; see also the authorities collected and discussed in Note, The First Amendment Overbreadth Doctrine, 83 HARV. L. REV. 844 (1970) and Note, The Chilling Effect in Constitutional Law, 69 COLUM. L. REV. 808 (1969).

It is also for reasons such as these that the State of New York and some commentators, in the approximately two years which have elapsed since this problem came to the forefront of public consciousness, have however reluctantly been drawn to the conclusion that nothing less than a full and unqualified First Amendment reporter's privilege (or something close to it) will do. N.Y. Civ.

[15] The treatment given to NEWSWEEK reporter Min Yee in Cuba, when it was suspected that his information and photographs might some day be subpoenaed by the Government, is typical of this situation. See Affidavit of Min S. Yee, verified March 23, 1970 (App. pp. 48–50).

Rights Law § 79–h (McKinney Supp. 1970); Note: Constitutional Protection for the Newsman's Work Product, 6 HARV. CIV. RIGHTS—CIV. LIB. L. REV. 119, 138 (1970); Note, Reporters and their Sources: the Constitutional Right to a Confidential Relationship, 80 YALE L.J. 317 (1970).

Because the privilege attendant upon confidential disclosures must be predictable with certainty, there has come an increasing recognition of the fact that any attempt, on an ad hoc basis, to resolve the constitutional issue raised by the newsman's dilemma will not and cannot serve the avowed aim of preserving a free press and an informed citizenry.

G. The Circumstances of This and Related Proceedings Themselves Demonstrate the Need for an Absolute Privilege.

It is singularly significant that Caldwell, the person subpoenaed in this proceeding, found it necessary to retreat from his original position that he would, if necessary, appear before the grand jury for the purpose of authenticating his story. This change in position was not grounded on doctrinaire considerations or an attempt to frustrate any proper governmental purpose. Rather, as the record establishes, Caldwell's shift was prompted by his belated recognition of the pragmatic consideration to which we have referred to support our position that nothing less than an absolute privilege will do. Caldwell came to realize that his mere appearance behind the closed doors of a grand jury room would destroy beyond redemption those very confidential relationships which he had so carefully cultivated and maintained, and the Ninth Circuit agreed.

The news article giving rise to the Caldwell subpoena quite obviously dealt with matters which were innocuous, or exculpatory of the Black Panthers, or, where incriminating, were of such widespread public knowledge that they could almost be the subject of judicial notice. Yet, the Government sought to cloak the grand jury investigation with an "overriding national interest" by asserting that it encompassed such matters as an attempt to assassinate the President, even though the Government did not claim—and does not claim even now—that Caldwell could provide the grand jury with evidence pertaining to any such matters.[16]

Moreover, it is obvious that, if Caldwell had appeared before the grand jury and had then asserted his privilege, he might have been faced with the claim that the information sought from him was not otherwise available because all others who had direct knowledge of the facts had pleaded the Fifth Amendment or had otherwise declined to testify. Furthermore, if Caldwell, once before the grand jury, had done nothing more than identify and authenticate his story, he would probably have been faced with the claim that he had "waived" his privilege. Cf., e.g., Rogers v. United States, 340 U.S. 367.

Considerations such as these are not merely the product of some brief writer's imagination; they are real and practical and, indeed, are forshadowed by the Government's statement (Br. at 12 n.9) that the constitutional arguments should here be deferred and dealt with at the district court level after Caldwell has been forced to appear. The result of following this suggestion is plainly predictable in the light of what happened in Judge Zirpoli's court when two other reporters, armed with a protective order similar to that granted Caldwell, actually appeared before the grand jury and invoked their "qualified privilege." In re Grand Jury Witnesses, 322 F. Supp. 573 (N. D. Cal. 1970).[17] Without even attempting to ascertain whether the evidence sought by the Government was otherwise obtainable. Judge Zirpoli held that the grand jury was engaged in an investigation of matters involving an overriding national interest and that the witnesses, therefore, were required to testify (Id. at 578). In short, as soon as witnesses whom the court itself recognized were entitled to a newsman's privilege sought to invoke that privilege before the grand jury, their claims were summarily rejected because their testimony fell within a purported exception. It is obvious that if this Court adopts the procedures which the Government urges here, and Caldwell appears before the grand jury, he, too, will be faced with an order to answer all questions, and, as the Government knows full well, his so-called privilege will evaporate.

[16] The Government (Br. at 3) refers to threats by David Hilliard, Chief of Staff of the Black Panther Party, to kill President Nixon: threats which were repeated on a number of occasions in a weekly periodical of the Black Panther Party. But the Government makes no claim that Caldwell can authenticate or testify to any of such threats, or that he was called before the grand jury for any purpose related to those threats. As appears from the Government's Brief (pp. 3–4 and 46), the statements which Caldwell was called to authenticate were generalized statements of the well-known position of the Black Panthers that they intended to engage in an armed struggle to overthrow the government by force and violence. Inasmuch as the grand jury is not bound by the hearsay rule, to the extent that these generalized, widely publicized views of the Black Panther Movement added anything to the Government's case against Hilliard, the Government needed only to offer to the grand jury the newspaper articles themselves.

[17] The two witnesses were also members of the Black Panther Party who had received a grant of immunity from prosecution, so that the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination was no longer available to them. Judge Zirpoli specifically found, however, that the witnesses were also "professional journalists" employed by the Black Panther newspaper and that they, like Caldwell, were entitled to assert the First Amendment newsmen's privilege.

In short, any attempt to apply Judge Zirpoli's formula—liberal though it may be by pre-Caldwell standards—will inevitably lead to grave practical difficulties and to the "drying up" of the reporter's sources of information. Unquestionably, if the holdings of the courts below represent the outer perimeter of protection afforded newsmen by the First Amendment, no newsman will ever be in a position to assure an informant with certainty that his confidence will not some day be disclosed. There is always the risk that some court may hold at a future date (a) that a matter under investigation involves some issue of "compelling and overriding national interest" or (b) that the reporter waived his privilege of nondisclosure by failing to assert it at the earliest opportunity. And what we have noted with respect to Judge Zirpoli's test applies equally to any other formulation we have seen of a limited or qualified newsman's privilege.

CONCLUSION

As this Court is well aware, the question, whether the First Amendment erects a privilege excusing newsmen from disclosing information under compulsion of subpoena, has never been passed upon here, and the lower court decisions are by no means consistent, either in result or rationale. One thing, however, is clear: Unless this Court puts a stop to the practice of compelling newsmen to testify with respect to information obtained by them in the course of their calling, sources of information heretofore available will dry up and First Amendment freedoms will suffer.

In summary, we submit that, under the First Amendment, newsmen must be accorded a privilege, absolute and unqualified, to refuse in all circumstances and without penalty to divulge to anyone any information or source, confidential or otherwise, obtained in the course of their professional newsgathering activities. The inhibiting impact of anything less—whether no privilege at all or a privilege which in any circumstance is subject to defeasance—is so patent, and the chilling effect upon freedom of the press is so plain, that this Court should not, consistent with the First Amendment, sanction anything less than the absolute, unqualified privilege we urge.

Respectfully submitted.

(No. 70-57—October Term, 1971)

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PETITIONER, v. EARL CALDWELL, RESPONDENT

On Writ of Certiorari to The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit

Brief of American Society of Newspaper Editors, Sigma Delta Chi, and Dow Jones & Company, Inc., as Amici Curiae, in Support of Earl Caldwell

Attorneys for The American Society of Newspaper Editors, Sigma Delta Chi, and Dow Jones & Company, Inc.

STATEMENT

The American Society of Newspaper Editors ("ASNE"), the national professional journalistic society Sigma Delta Chi, and Dow Jones & Company, Inc. ("Dow Jones"), a Delaware Corporation, pursuant to the written consent of petitioner (United States) and respondent Earl Caldwell, hereby submit this Joint Brief as amici curiae in support of the position taken by Earl Caldwell in this litigation.

This brief will be directed to the principal issue here involved, i.e., the necessity for this Court to affirm that the First Amendment affords to journalists a constitutional privilege to refuse to submit to compulsory process when such submittal would force journalists to disclose confidential information obtained in the course of their professional journalistic activities.[1]

II

INTEREST OF AMERICAN SOCIETY OF NEWSPAPER EDITORS, SIGMA DELTA CHI, AND DOW JONES & COMPANY, INC.

The American Society of Newspaper Editors is a nationwide professional organization of more than 740 persons holding positions as directing editors of daily newspapers throughout the United States. The purposes of the Society, which was founded fifty years ago, include the maintenance of "the dignity and rights of the profession,"[2] and the continuing duty to improve the manner in which the journalism profession carries out its responsibility of providing a free and unfettered press in the service of the American people.

Sigma Delta Chi is the society of students and practitioners of journalism. It has over 100 student chapters, over 100 professional chapters, and more than 21,000 members, among whom are included the most distinguished journalists in the United States.

Dow Jones & Company, Inc. is the publisher of The Wall Street Journal, Barron's Business and Financial Weekly, The National Observer, and The Dow Jones News Services, all with circulation throughout the United States.

Members of ASNE, Sigma Delta Chi, and Dow Jones, as individuals and as members of these institutions, have become increasingly alarmed at the unprecedented use by local, state and federal prosecutors of compulsory process to attempt to obtain information acquired by journalists in the course of their news gathering activities. The increasing issuance of subpoenas ad testificandum and duces tecum to working newspapermen is an abrupt departure from over a century and a half of practice, and directly threatens the ability of journalists to fulfill their professional responsibility. More important, the use of compulsory process to force journalists to disclose information given them in confidence can, if unchecked, quickly reduce the guaranties of the First Amendment to illusory promises.

[1] The government urges (Br., pp. 8-9) that United States v. Caldwell (No. 70-57) does not raise the question of the existence of a First Amendment protection for newsmen but, rather, the "much narrower" issue of whether a reporter can refuse to appear before a grand jury about matters concededly nonconfidential. The amici do not agree with this characterization. As the Court of Appeals recognized below, the issue before it rested "upon the same First Amendment foundation" as did Judge Zirpoli's protective order since before it could decide the question of whether a more protective order was required, "we must first decide whether it requires any privilege at all." The same considerations apply here.

Moreover, as will be discussed below, the absence of an authoritative decision by this Court on the broad question of First Amendment rights has led to inconsistent opinions in the courts below, and to understandable confusion on the part of the public and newsmen as to the scope of protection afforded, all of which has resulted in instances where the public's right to know may well have been compromised because of the uncertainty of the law. The amici recognize that this Court has agreed to consider the Pappas (No. 70-94) and Branzburg (No. 70-85) cases, which also involve the scope of First Amendment protection, so that it is obvious that the Court desires to treat the matter in a comprehensive and authoritative fashion.

[2] Preamble to the Constitution of ASNE.

The affidavits alreday submitted by Earl Caldwell, and by the other journalists in the proceeding below, demonstrate quite effectively the chilling effect which this practice has had upon the journalistic profession.[3] The views expressed in these affidavits, and the chilling effect shown therein which they have already had upon the ability of newspapermen to gather and publish relevant information, are neither singular nor sui generis. The Association has collected similar affidavits from other journalists throughout the country which fully affirm the experiences of the affiants below.[4]

The experiences of the reporters already in the record, and the experiences of members of ASNE, Sigma Delta Chi, and Dow Jones, indicate that the rights of journalists (and a fortiori the right of the public to a free press) are all too often bartered piecemeal in frenzied negotiations between prosecutors, newspaper, and newspapermen in an atmosphere of broadly drawn subpoenas, contempt citation threats, and hastily convened legal proceedings seeking protective orders, all attended by the bluff and bluster which sometimes surround such maneuverings. The tyranny of time, the press of other matters, and the depth of the commitment to a free press of the particular participants involved, have all combined to create a chaotically inconsistent nation-wide pattern of response. In some cases, government attorneys have voluntarily redrawn such subpoenas if resistance is encountered from either the newspaper or the journalist. In other cases, newspapermen have arrived at an accommodation with the government, voluntarily yielding certain information in return for the government dropping other demands. On still other occasions, journalists who did not have the resources or the time to combat subpoenas, have acceded to such demands, often much against their will and to the detriment of their future ability to gather and report news. All these events have taken place in a legal framework which lacks specific direction through an authoritative opinion of this Court indicating the limits of the government's power in the area.

The amici are deeply disturbed that the serious and substantial constitutional problems underlying this issue must be handled in such an ad hoc and unsatisfactory manner. The ultimate loser in such contests is the public, whose right to a free flow of information is thus often bartered away under circumstances least conducive towards protecting First Amendment rights. The amici believe and urge upon this Court that, in general terms, the First Amendment grants to newsmen constitutional protection, absolute and unqualified, to refuse to divulge under compulsion any information that newsmen believe would compromise their ability to carry out their professional news gathering activities. For reasons which appear below, the amici believe that any lesser protection cannot afford the press or the public the constitutional rights to which they are entitled.

[3] See, particularly, affidavits of journalists Caldwell, Kifner, Knight, Proffitt, Ripley Turner and Lukas. Similar affidavits have been filed below in amici briefs for Newsweek, Inc. (journalists Lowell, Morgan and Yee) and the Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. (broadcast journalists Cronkite, Sevareid, Wallace, Rather and Kalb). All of these affidavits demonstrate the importance of maintaining confidential sources of information, and all stress that any constriction of the scope of the confidential relationship will have (and has already had) devastating consequences on journalists' ability to present the news.

[4] The practice of wholesale issuance of subpoenas, the protracted legal proceedings which often follow thereafter, and the chilling effect which these subpoenas have already had (even in those instances where the subpoenas were later withdrawn or quashed) has been demonstrated by affidavits collected by ASNE from reporters in Providence, Rhode Island (The Providence Journal and the Evening Bulletin); Los Angeles, California (Los Angeles Times); St. Louis, Mo. (St. Louis Post-Dispatch); and Chicago, Ill. (Chicago Daily News and Chicago Sun-Times). For example, over the past three years it is a matter of record that more than 30 subpoenas have been served on newspapers published by Field Enterprises, Inc., two-thirds of which were issued on behalf of the government. One Chicago Sun-Times reporter (Duane Hall) was subpoenaed to testify in eleven separate proceedings in the space of eighteen months.

THE FIRST AMENDMENT REQUIRES THE PROTECTION OF NEWSMEN FROM COMPULSORY DISCLOSURE OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION

A. The Primacy of the First Amendment Protection for the Press

There is little disagreement that the press in the United States has been assigned a unique and vital role in the ongoing dynamic of American democracy a role whose singular nature has been repeatedly recognized by the courts, and a role given life through the adoption of the First Amendment that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." That this Amendment, and the freedom of speech and press protected thereby, is the very foundation of free government by free men has been so oft-emphasized that it has become a cliche.

The special role and function of the press, and the protection which it requires if it is to carry out its projected function, was recognized at the creation of the Republic. It was described by Mr. Madison thusly:

> In every State, probably, in the Union, the press has exerted a freedom in canvassing the merits and measures of public men of every description which has not been confined to the strict limits of the common law. On this footing the freedom of the press has stood; on this footing it yet stands. . . . Some degree of abuse is inseparable from the proper use of everything, and in no instance is this more true than in that of the press. It has accordingly been decided by the practice of the States, that it is better to leave a few of its noxious branches to their luxuriant growth, than, by pruning them away, to injure the vigour of those yielding the proper fruits. And can the wisdom of this policy be doubted by any who reflect that to the press alone, chequered as it is with abuses, the world is indebted for all the triumphs which have been gained by reason and humanity over error and oppression; who reflect that to the same beneficent source the United States owe much of the lights which conducted them to the ranks of a free and independent nation. . . .[5]

As Chief Justice Hughes pointed out in Near v. Minnesota, the role of the press envisioned by the founders was as the vigilant protector of the liberties of the people and the instrument "whereby oppressive officers are shamed or intimidated into more honorable and just modes of conducting affairs." (supra, at p. 717.) This characterization has been repeatedly emphasized. In Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233. 250 (1936), the Court described the role of the press:

> The newspapers, magazines and other journals of the country, it is safe to say, have shed and continue to shed, more light on the public and business affairs of the nation than any other instrumentality of publicity; and since informed public opinion is the most potent of all restraints upon misgovernment, the suppression or abridgement of the publicity afforded by a free press cannot be regarded otherwise than with grave concern.
> A free press stands as one of the great interpreters between the government and the people. To allow it to be fettered is to fetter ourselves.

In Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 522 (1960), Mr. Justice Stewart pointed out:

> Like freedom of speech and a free press, the right of peaceable assembly was considered by the Framers of our Constitution to lie at the foundation of a government based upon the consent of an informed citizenry—a government dedicated to the establishment of justice and the preservation of liberty. U.S. Const.. Amend. I.

In Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 74–5 (1964), the Court stated:

> [S]peech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government.

And in Red Lion v. Federal Communications Commission, 395 U.S. 367, 390 (1969), this Court recognized that:

> It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited market place of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail. . .

---

[5] See Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 718 (1931).

The primacy of press freedom was given transcending eloquence in the oft-quoted language of Associated Press v. U.S., 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945):

> [The First] Amendment rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public, that a free press is a condition of a free society.

Moreover, it is not merely the right of the individual journalist to follow his profession which is here at stake. Rather, the rights which the amici seek to vindicate "are not for the benefit of the press so much as for the benefit of all of us."[6] As Justice Stewart so cogently indicated in Red Lion, supra, the First Amendment is concerned less with the reporter than with his audience (395 U.S. at 390):

> It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, aesthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here.

Thus, the focus of the issues in the instant case is not upon the reporter's right to exercise his own free speech. The issue, rather, is the protection of the public's right to know and its right to receive information through a free and untrammeled press.

B. First Amendment Protection of Confidentiality Is Essential if the Press Is To Fulfill Its Constitutional Role

We submit that it is no longer open to serious doubt that the protection of the confidential sources and confidential relationships of journalists is a sine qua non if the press is to exercise the viligant role envisioned by the writers of the Constitution. As the reporter-affiants below have demonstrated, cultivation of, and reliance upon, "off-the-record" information is essential for proper reporting, and this is true not only in the case of unpopular or militant groups, but holds true for reporting of political, military and diplomatic information at the highest government levels. Unless newsmen are free to obtain "background information" of a confidential nature, it is difficult, if not impossible, for them to accurately report the meaning of events, or even themselves to understand and interpret events as they unfold. Unless official and unofficial sources can feel free to meet reporters in confidence, it is unlikely that they will feel free to tell reporters of official derelictions in high quarters, or of bureaucratic inefficiency, or of the myraid facts which a reporter must know if he is to act as a vigilant ombudsman. We know, as newsmen, that reporters can get valuable information only because informants know and understand that their confidences will be respected, and the affidavits below (see particularly the affidavits of Kifner, Knight, Ripley, Noble, and Yee) bear testimony to the debilitating impact of compulsory disclosure on a reporter's ability to cover the news. Unless newsmen are free to meet in confidence with members of dissident groups who espouse unpopular ideas, the public may never have the opportunity of hearing these ideas set forth in an objective setting so that the public itself may evaluate their potency and validity.[7] If the press ceases to be an independent institution seeking truth, but, instead, becomes an unwilling extension of the State's prosecutorial power, there is little likelihood that the cause of freedom of information will be served.

As the reporter-affiants below testified in their uncontradicted affidavits, the ability of the press to cover dissident or militant groups has been severely hampered, if not destroyed, by the proclivities of overzealous prosecutors to substitute the fruits of investigative reporting for police legwork. This testimony led District Judge Zirpoli to specifically find that "compelled disclosure of information received by a journalist within the scope of . . . confidential relationships jeopardizes those relationships and thereby impairs the journalist's ability to gather, analyze and publish the news." This finding was adopted by the Ninth Circuit, and it has not been contested by the government either in the District Court, in the Court of Appeals, or here.

[6] Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 389 (1967).

[7] As Judge Merrill indicated in the opinion of the Ninth Circuit below (434 F. 2d 1081, 1084 (9th Cir. 1970):

> "It is not enough that the public's knowledge of groups such as the Black Panthers should be confined to their deliberate public pronouncements or distant news accounts of their occasional dramatic forays into the public view."

It would be wasteful of space to enumerate all the now accepted concepts which at one time were unpopular or even forbidden by the powers of society, including, it should be noted, the once very unpopular idea that the Colonies should declare their independence of King George III.

But we need not rely only upon the affidavits of newsmen or the findings of the Courts below in the instant case. The importance of the protection of confidential sources and the need for limits upon compulsory process on journalists was recognized by Attorney General Mitchell who acknowledged the need for some protection of news sources.

> The Department of Justice recognizes that compulsory process in some circumstances may have a limiting effect on the exercise of First Amendment rights.[8]

Even those courts which have refused to recognize a common law or First Amendment right limiting compulsory process on journalists, have nevertheless understood that their refusals placed serious constrictions upon the ability of newspapers to perform their functions. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania candidly conceded in In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193 A.2d 181, 185 (1963) that:

> We would be unrealistic if we did not take judicial notice of another matter of wide public knowledge and great importance, namely, that important information, tips and leads will dry up and the public will often be deprived of the knowledge of dereliction of public duty, bribery, corruption, conspiracy and other crimes committed or possibly committed by public officials or by powerful individuals or organizations unless newsmen are able to fully and completely protect the sources of their information. It is vitally important that this public shield against governmental inefficiency, corruption and crime be preserved against piercing and erosion.

Similar perceptions were voiced by Mr. Justice Stewart (then Circuit Judge) in Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545, 548 (2d Cir. 1958):

> . . . [W]e accept at the outset the hypothesis that compulsory disclosure of a journalist's confidential sources of information may entail an abridgement of press freedom by imposing some limitation upon the availability of news.

Thus, it must be recognized that allowing compulsory process to force newsmen to reveal either confidential information or confidential sources, is a direct and explicit violation of First Amendment freedoms. The real issue here is whether a case can be made by the government which would justify a conceded violation of the precise language of the First Amendment. We believe that the government certainly has not made out such a case in the instant circumstances, and that it is unlikely that it can ever do so.

C. The Government has Not Established that the Convenience of, or even the Necessity for, Compulsory Testimony Overcomes the Explicit Command of the First Amendment

The government certainly did not establish a "compelling need" for Mr. Caldwell's testimony before the grand jury simply because, as indicated in the opinions below, the government never believed it necessary even to attempt to do so. The United States Attorney never came forth with any evidence to demonstrate the need for ignoring the plain language of the First Amendment.[9]

The government's utter failure to support its demand for compulsory process on witness Caldwell by a requisite showing of need has, in a narrow sense, made this case rather easy of decision. This Court has held innumerable times that abridgement of First Amendment freedoms can be allowed, if at all, only upon a showing of the most compelling urgency and need. Although phrased in varying formulations, this Court has never wavered from the principle that the limitation of First Amendment rights can be justified only in the name of "compelling and subordinating governmental interest"[10] or a showing of "paramount" need.[11] or a demonstration of "controlling justification"[12] or "subordinating interest."[13]

[8] It is gratifying that Attorney General Mitchell has now adopted guidelines which give newspapermen at least a modicum of protection, and which the government asserts now insures that cases such as those at bar will not again occur in the Federal courts. The difficulty, however, with these "guidelines" is that they have no binding validity on state courts or indeed upon any investigative body, Federal or state, other than those supervised by the Federal judiciary. As the Branzburg and Pappas cases indicate, the issuance of subpoenas to newsmen and newspapers is at least as prevalent a practice in the state courts as in the Federal courts. Moreover, the Attorney General's guidelines contain a saving clause whereby the Attorney General reserves the right to violate the guidelines in a particular instance if "emergencies and other unusual situations" develop. This caveat re-introduces the very uncertainty and ambiguity which has plagued newspapermen during the recent past and which impels the amici to urge the adoption of an absolute and easily understood rule.

[9] There is no doubt, of course, that the strictures of the First Amendment apply to all government action, including issuance of subpoenas, as well as compulsory process issued by any governmental body, whether federal, state, or local, administrative, executive or judiciary. See Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479 (1965) (State Statute); Reed Enterprises v. Corcoran, 354 F. 2d 519 (D.C. Cir. 1965) (Federal Criminal Prosecution); Liveright v. Joint Committee, 279 F. Supp. 205 (M.D. Tenn., 1968); Stamler v. Willis, 371 F. 2d 413 (7th Cir. 1966) (Federal Legislative Investigation).

The insistence of District Judge Zirpoli and the Ninth Circuit that the government, at the very least, make a showing of need for the issuance of compulsory process is fully consonant with, and supported by, prior judicial opinions on the scope of newsmen's protection, even those opinions which ultimately refused to accord protection in the particular case. Thus, for example, Mr. Justice Stewart (then Circuit Judge) in Garland v. Torre,[14] implicitly recognized the limits upon the State's ability to require compulsory process on newsmen, and recognized, we believe, that a showing of necessity is required before compulsory process can be supported. In Garland, the court recognized the First Amendment issues at stake and allowed compulsory process only after closely examining the facts of the case and noting that the case did not involve "wholesale disclosure of a newspaper's confidential source of news," concerned the "heart of the plaintiff's claim" and that the plaintiff had demonstrated the unavailability of the information sought by any means other than compulsory process. The tenor of the opinion makes clear that under different circumstances, and without a compelling showing of need, the court might well have found compulsory process to be improper.[15]

The failure of the government here to demonstrate in any way that the information sought from Caldwell was essential to the government's interests, or was even particularly relevant or material to the grand jury's purpose, is a defect which, under Garland, is sufficient to defeat its claim.[16]

We urge, moreover, that under recent developments of the law, and by analysis of similar protections accorded other analogous confidential relationships, it would indeed be impossible for the government ever to demonstrate the type of "compelling need" which would justify the explicit violation of the First Amendment which compulsory process upon journalists would entail. Simply stated, the amici do not believe that the need for compulsory process outweighs the explicit commandment of the First Amendment to protect and nurture a free and untrammeled press.

The basis for the government's claim lies in the oft-quoted admonition that the law is entitled to every man's evidence, and that reporters have no special dispensation to avoid the requirement of testifying in judicial proceedings.[17] In general, of course, the proposition is correct. But, as with most generalities, it cannot be taken literally. Indeed, the very case (Blair v. United States) which cemented the proposition into law made clear that there were significant exceptions to this rule which have been crafted out of recognition that the transcendental requirements of justice make it necessary to protect certain relationships from compulsory process.[18]

New York Times Co.* v. United States (No. 1873) and United States v. The Washington Post Company (No. 1885), decided June 30, 1971, 39 U.S.L.W. 4879, where the per curiam opinion of this Court adverted to the "heavy burden of showing justification" in the case of a prior restraint on the exercise of free speech.

[15] Most later cases on the point rely upon Garland, either allowing or refusing a journalist's claim to protection essentially upon a balancing process. The opinions of Judge Zirpoli and the Ninth Circuit are in the tenor of Garland, as are other lower court opinions limiting the right of the government to compulsory process of newsmen. See People v. Dohrn, Crim. No. 69-3808, Cook County Circuit Court, Chicago, Ill.; Wisconsin v. Knops, Supreme Court of Wisconsin, State No. 146; Alioto v. Cowles Communications, Inc., Civil Action 5210, N.D. California.

Although the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in dictum in In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193 A. 2d 181 (1963) did not recognize the existence of a First Amendment right to protection, nevertheless, the Court broadly construed the Pennsylvania newsman's exemption statute as granting protection for the materials there involved. The Court broadly construed the statute to confer a wide scope of protection precisely because of First Amendment considerations.

We are cognizant that other jurisdictions have refused to recognize the existence of a First Amendment right to protection and have allowed compulsory process in the absence of any showing of need. See, e.g., In re Goodfader's Appeal, 45 Hawaii 317, 367 P. 2d 472 (1961), State v. Buchanan, 250 Oregon 244, 436 P. 2d 729 (1968), cert. denied 392 U.S. 905. For reasons described in the instant brief, we believe these cases to have been erroneously decided, and submit that they should not be followed by this Court.

[16] The government asserts (Br. pp. 34–38) that the traditional secrecy and purpose of grand jury proceedings make it improper to disclose the specific purpose of the investigation, the topics to be covered, or (except in the most general way) the relevance or materiality of the material sought in the investigation. But this argument only demonstrates the impropriety of using grand jury subpoenas to force newsmen to disclose the confidential sources of their confidential information. That the government cannot meet the standards of Garland with respect to grand jury subpoenas is certainly not the fault of journalists.

[17] Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 281 (1919):

> . . . [I]t is clearly recognized that the giving of testimony and the attendance upon court or grand jury in order to testify are public duties which every person within the jurisdiction of the government is bound to perform upon being properly summoned.

The clearest examples of such exceptions, of course, are those of the so-called "evidentiary privileges." Thus, a client has a privilege to keep from disclosure confidences given to his attorney,[19] a patient has a privilege to shield from disclosure confidences given to his physician,[20] at common law a spouse could keep from compulsory process disclosures to a spouse,[21] similar rules at common law and/or by statute protect disclosures between priest and penitent,[22] between a client and his accountant, and between a "registered psychologist" and his client.[23] And, of course, the courts have long recognized the necessity of an "informer" privilege whereby the government need not ordinarily reveal the source of an informant's testimony, even in a criminal prosecution.[24]

In all of the above instances, courts have recognized the existence of values which transcended the otherwise applicable requirement that each citizen give testimony. The administration of justice, not to mention the protection of the rights of individuals, are better served by protecting the confidentiality of the attorney-client privilege than by the short term and fleeting advantage which the disclosure of such confidences may have in an individual case. The well-being of society as a whole is better served by the allowance of confidences between a priest and a penitent than by forcing disclosure. The importance of maintaining an informer's anonymity to the long term administration of justice, and to the protection of the "flow of information" to the government (Roviaro, supra, 353 U.S. at 62), are recognized as generally (though not always) superseding the requirement of compulsory process, even in the defense of a criminal prosecution, and in the face of the Sixth Amendment's assurance to a criminal defendant of compulsory process.[25]

But the so-called evidentiary "privileges" do not by any means exhaust the areas of exception to compulsory process. The courts have often surrendered accessibility to otherwise relevant evidence when other considerations require their unavailability. The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and the decisions thereunder, require suppression of confessions obtained without the necessary judicial prerequisites.[26] The courts have long excluded otherwise relevant and material evidence obtained through illegal search and seizure.[27] The government has unquestioned power to withhold relevant and material evidence if it reasonably believes that disclosure would expose matters "which, in the interest of national security, should not be divulged." [28] And, of course, the most massive exclusionary rule ever devised is embodied in the Fifth Amendment which deprives not only courts but every government agency of testimony from the most potentially fruitful source of information because the drafters of the Constitution deemed the right to remain silent more important than the ability of the government to administer justice through self-incrimination.[29]

More significantly, however, the law does not require that a particular witness possessing these protections make a threshold showing of "necessity" in order to invoke his right to protection. Nor does the right to protection depend upon a balancing of the nature of the confidence sought to be protected against the effect which exclusion would have on the long range public interest. Thus, a client need not demonstrate that release of a particular piece of confidential information which passed between himself and his attorney would "irreparably injure him" if disclosed, nor in a criminal prosecution would the government be allowed to plead that the attorney-client confidence should be breached because in the particular case the interests of "national security" or "administration of justice" or whatever so required.[30] The government could not so plead with respect to any of the so-called evidentiary "privileges", or any of the other exclusionary rules deriving from the Fourth or Fifth Amendments. On the contrary, once the witness claims his right to protection (or in the case of the exclusionary rules, the applicability of the exclusionary rule becomes apparent), the matter is foreclosed. The courts do not countenance further investigation into the nature of the confidences for the simple reason that to do so would, in practical effect, vitiate the protection intended to be conferred.[31] The courts do not engage in ad hoc "balancing" considerations simply because the law has already balanced the accounts and has found the scales to be weighted on the side of protection.

[18] Blair, supra at 281:

> The duty . . . is subject to mitigation in exceptional circumstances; there is a constitutional exception from being compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against oneself . . .; some confidential matters are shielded from consideration of policy, and perhaps in other cases for special reasons a witness may be excused from telling all that he knows.

[25] We wish to emphasize that we do not claim a "privilege" for newsmen, although the newsmen's protection commanded by the First Amendment is often loosely termed a "privilege." The right which we seek to vindicate is not the personal right of a newspaper man to any "privilege." It is the right of the public to receive information which is here involved.

We believe that the protection of journalists from compulsory disclosure of confidential information is a right of such enduring importance to the preservation of our democratic system that it falls within the constellation of interests protected by the evidentiary privileges and exclusionary rules cited above. In view of the undoubted (indeed, conceded) importance of confidential relationships to the gathering and dissemination of news and information, and in view of the fact that compulsory disclosure of such confidence directly trenches upon the First Amendment, we cannot believe that any of the privileges or the exclusionary rules referred to above stand on a higher footing than protection of a newsman in the fulfillment of his constitutional role as ombudsman of the democratic system. That First Amendment freedoms are delicate and precious rights which need "breathing space" to survive,[32] "strong medicine" for protection,[33] and are to be protected even to the point where newspapers are accorded protections not accorded to individual citizens,[34] are propositions now well established in constitutional law. If any doubt remained, it was dissipated by this Court's opinion in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964) and its progeny[35] expanding the protection accorded to the press. The Court recognized in New York Times (376 U.S. at pp. 269–70):

> The general proposition that freedom of expression upon public questions is secured by the First Amendment has long been settled by our decisions. The constitutional safeguard, we have said, "was fashioned to assure unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people." Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 484. . . . The First Amendment, said Judge Learned Hand "presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues, than through any kind of authoritative selection. To many this is, and always will be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all." United States v. Associated Press, 52 F. Supp. 362, 372 (D.C.S.D.N.Y. 1943).

The protection accorded in New York Times has been given expensive interpretation, and now includes newspaper coverage of private individuals as well as blic figures, and electronic journalism as well as print journalism.[36] These deci- ons are, we believe, the culmination of a maturing and sensitive recognition by e Court that, in an increasingly complex and interrelated world, where the verage citizen necessarily can know by personal knowledge only the smallest action of the events which affect his life, the role of the free press is even more sential to the maintenance of American democracy than in the past. Unless e First Amendment guarantee of press freedom is protected to the fullest tent, the role which it has played will inevitably be diminished. If this happens, will be the public, and not merely the press, which is the loser.

[31] As this Court noted in Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479, 486 (1951), "if the witness, upon interposing his claim [to protection], were required to prove the hazard in the sense in which a claim is usually required to be established in court, he would be compelled to surrender the very protection which the privilege is designed to guarantee." It might be thought that an exception to this rule exists by virtue of the Supreme Court's holding that the government was not entitled to maintain its "informer" privilege in circumstances where the overwhelming interest of justice required disclosure. See Roviaro, supra. However, it should be noted that even here the government would not be forced to disclose in all circumstances. It could avoid disclosure by dropping the litigation. We suggest that similar considerations could apply to newspapers, so that if newspapers and journalists voluntarily initiate court proceedings, the courts could, if the circumstances so warranted, require that the journalists be required to choose between maintaining the suit or voluntarily disclosing their sources.

III

HE EFFECTUATION OF THE FIRST AMENDMENT'S MANDATE REQUIRES ABSOLUTE, NOT LIMITED OR QUALIFIED PROTECTION, AND MUST INCLUDE THE RIGHT TO REFUSE TO APPEAR BEFORE ANY STATE INVESTIGATOR OR JUDICIAL BODY, INCLUDING THE GRAND JURY

The amici believe that for newspapers to obtain the full protection to which hey are entitled by the First Amendment, journalists must be accorded an bsolute and unqualified right to protection from compulsory process, including he right to refuse to appear or testify before any governmental investigative or udicial body, including the grand jury.

We recognize the reluctance with which courts generally view the establish- nent of absolute and unqualified protections, particularly where these protections perate to deprive the courts of what otherwise might be relevant or material vidence. We also recognize that it is impossible, as a practical matter, to envision ll possible future situations in which the protection might be invoked, so that he judiciary generally is reluctant to establish absolute requirements which may ater have to be set aside when the unforseen and unusual instance occurs. Never- heless, we believe that nothing less than the establishment of unqualified protec- ion would, as a practical matter, comport with the First Amendment's require- nents. Our reasons for this position are:

1. As the government recognizes, the focus in this case is not the effect which denial of protection has upon the individual newspaper or journalist. Rather, it s the "degree of chill being generated on the conduct of others" (Government Brief, p. 27). The danger we face is not that reporters will cease attempting to eport news, for this will not happen. What will happen (and what indeed has already happened in the instances discussed by the reporter-affiants below)[37] is hat groups or individuals will refuse to discuss their activities with reporters ecause they fear that journalists may be forced by compulsory process to divulge heir identity and their confidences. We thus deal as much with appearances and reactions, as with the activity of reporters.

The District Court recognized the legitimacy of these fears, and the importance of appearances, by a protective order limiting disclosures only to "non-confiden- tial" matters. The Ninth Circuit was even more sensitive to the fact of appear- ances and went beyond the District Court's protection, correctly (in our judgment) deciding that even the mere requirement of witness Caldwell's physi- cal presence in the grand jury room is sufficient to vitiate the public's confi- dence.[38]

We believe the Ninth Circuit's perceptive appreciation of the dangers to free expression of compulsory appearance before the grand jury is fully warranted and accords with the amici's practical experience in reportage. Indeed, we believe that the Ninth District's decision, bold as it is, should be even further expanded and that under no circumstances (even in the face of an assertion or demonstration of "compelling need") should a newsman be required to appear before any investigative body.

[36] See note 35, supra.

[37] See affidavits of journalists Kifner, Ripley, Noble, Lowell and Yee.

[38] The Ninth Circuit astutely observed that the witness Caldwell had established a relationship of trust and confidence which rested "on continuing reassurances" of confidentiality (Appendix 123):

> This reassurance disappears when the reporter is called to testify behind closed doors. The secrecy that surrounds Grand Jury testimony necessarily introduces uncertainty in the minds of those who fear a betrayal of their confidences. These uncertainties are compounded by the subtle nature of the journalist-informer relation. The demarcation between what is confidential and what is for publication is not sharply drawn and often depends upon the particular context or timing of the use of the information. Militant groups might very understandably fear that, under the pressure of examination before a Grand Jury, the witness may fail to protect their confidences with quite the same sure judgment he invokes in the normal course of his professional work.

The reason is simply that no one, even those most sophisticated in the law, can predict with any certainty what the courts will deem a "compelling need," or what would be considered "confidential" or "non-confidential" at a period in time much later than the events themselves. The uncertainty introduced by anything other than an absolute and unconditional protection may (and indeed already has) constricted the free flow of information to reporters which is essential to their function. This uncertainty with respect to rights directly conferred by the First Amendment brings the newsman's protection within the scope of the constitutional doctrines of "vagueness" and "overbreadth":

> Because First Amendment freedoms need breathing space to survive, government may regulate in the area only with narrow specificity.[39]

Protection, the scope or existence of which is uncertain and made to depend upon what courts in the future may decide, will not easily be understood or appreciated by the average citizen and will inevitably have the "chilling effect" which this Court has already proscribed.[40]

In Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 487 (1965) this Court pointed out the necessity, in the First Amendment area, of avoiding "making vindication of freedom of expression await the outcome of protracted litigation." We do not believe that the statute at issue in Dombrowski, or in other cases where the Court has struck down vague statutory language,[41] would have been saved from constitutional infirmity merely by the insertion that the statute would become operative only upon a showing of "compelling need" or "supervening necessity." Such concepts are as illusive of definition as they are incapable of the precision which is required when free speech considerations are involved. What is required here, if the First Amendment protection is to have any meaning, is the promulgation of an absolute rule, simple of discernment, precise as to scope, and easy of application.

2. It might be urged that affording subpoenaed journalists a protective order, plus requiring their appearance only upon a showing of compelling need, is sufficient protection because the journalists will be required to divulge little, if anything, which they deem confidential. But requiring the appearance of the journalists at the grand jury proceeding only to have them invoke their protection is commanding an essentially useless act (from the government's point of view), while at the same time requiring an act which per se has debilitating effects upon the public's confidence in the scope of protection. And, of course, if the government at any point challenges whether or not the invocation of confidentiality in the grand jury room is warranted (or, if a protective order has been issued, if the government challenges whether the order reaches the particular matter involved) further judicial proceedings will be required. At this point the court either has the option to accept at face value the claim of confidentiality (which, as noted, is the course often taken in the case of the evidentiary privilege rules) or to subject the witness to further hearing under circumstances whereby the very confidentiality sought to be protected is vitiated. In these circumstances the protection is hardly any protection at all.[42]

[40] The government urges that the reporter-affiants below do not contend that their mere appearance before the grand jury will have harmful effects. The government reads the reporters' affidavits as asserting only a demand for protection for material and sources obtained in confidence. The amici do no so read the affidavits. The gist of these affidavits in toto demonstrates a desire to protect any loss of confidence in reporters by citizens and they demonstrate an awareness that even the appearance of journalists' submission to compulsory process would have that effect. See, particularly, affidavits of journalists Kifner, Ripley, Noble, Lowell and Yee.

[42] The government in its Brief is concerned that the secrecy of grand jury proceedings be protected. Indeed, the necessity of such protection is the basis upon which the government urges that requiring a showing of compelling need is improper since it might vitiate such secrecy. (Br. pp. 42–44.) The government's position, we believe, is precisely the reason why reliance upon special showings of need (or limitations on confidentiality only to matters which are "essential" to the case) are more dangerous to the long term interests of justice than would be the adoption of an absolute rule, easy of discernment, precise as to scope, and easy of application.

3. As noted above, courts do not require showings of "compelling need" or indulge in ad hoc balancing considerations when dealing with the so-called "evidentiary privileges" or with other exclusionary rules which have been fashioned in order to protect transcendent or overriding considerations of public policy. Why should such requirements be imposed here, where the government has not shown any historical evidence that the unavailability of journalists testimony has had a detrimental effect upon the administration of justice?

It is quite true, of course, that the law does not ordinarily allow a witness to refuse even to appear in response to a subpoena. The witness ordinarily must appear and then, in response to specific questions, invoke whatever protection the law allows. But in the ordinary case, a witness appears only in his proper person and can invoke the rules only with respect to his own protection. The role of the journalists is quite different, since we are concerned less with the impact of disclosure upon the journalist himself, than upon the public generally, and with the very appearance of compliance having precisely the detrimental effect which the First Amendment forbids.

There might be force to the government's argument if it could demonstrate that the unavailability of journalists' evidence has hampered law enforcement in the past. The government has not done so, however, nor indeed did it demonstrate even in the instant case that the unavailability of witness Caldwell to the grand jury unduly impeded its investigations. The relative paucity of cases on the point (until very recently) indicates that prosecutors have not sought compulsory process on journalists in the past, nor does the historical literature indicate that they have felt hampered by their failure to do so. The lack of necessity for journalist testimony can be discerned from the fact that numerous jurisdictions[43] have enacted statutory bars to compulsory process against newsmen, some absolute and some conditional. As indicated in the reports of the New York Law Review Commission,[44] statements from law enforcement officials in those jurisdictions having a so-called reporter's privilege make it clear that the existence of the privilege has not impeded law enforcement and may have aided it. The experience of these jurisdictions, and the fact that their number has steadily increased over the years[45] indicate a growing recognition that protection of journalistic confidences has a long range beneficial effect on the administration of justice which far transcends any fleeting short term gain which may appear possible in a particular prosecution.

4. Dilution of newspapermen's protection by limitations or qualifications is apt to be most damaging to the exercise of First Amendment freedoms, and to the public's ability to comprehend affairs, precisely at the time when such protection is most required. It is no accident or coincidence that the recent spate of investigatory subpoenas arises during a period of social turmoil, when many groups in our society (throughout the political spectrum) feel the need to protest and to challenge what, in other times have been almost universally accepted maxims. Yet, it is precisely at these times when governments feel most threatened in their security and are most likely to overact through open-end investigations,[46] broad range subpoenas, electronic and other surveillance, and the like. It is also at these times when deviant or aggressive political behaviour is prone to be characterized by diligent prosecutors as a threat to "national security," or as an apt subject for pervasive investigation. During such times, courts must often assess such governmental claims in the absence of concrete evidence with advocates' hyperbole as the only guide. There is an inescapable temptation to accept prosecutorial assertions as a showing of "compelling need" sufficient to overcome a newsman's protection if a "balancing" test is to be applied.

And it is precisely in these times when the public must have the fullest access to the views of dissident groups so that their claims and their tactics can be understood and evaluated. It does no service to the cause of democracy to silence these groups or drive them underground. Because the public requires the newsman's protection most particularly in times of stress, we believe an absolute and unqualified protection is required. Anything less may sacrifice the public's right to know at a point in time when the right is most necessary.

We concede the possibility that there may exist a situation where a particular crime will go unpunished, or a potentially dangerous activity go uninvestigated, if this Court grants the relief here sought by Caldwell. While this, indeed, may be the case, we believe it a price which must be paid if the First Amendment is to be respected, in the same way as we pay the price for such constitutional protections as the Fourth, Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. And the absence of any convincing demonstration by the government that recognition of journalists' protection has in fact in the past, or has in fact in the cases at bar, proven an insurmountable obstacle in criminal prosecution, serves to further assure this Court that recognition of journalists' protection as embodied in the First Amendment will fully serve the public interest.

CONCLUSION

WHEREFORE, in view of the above, it is respectfully requested that this Court affirm the recognition of the newspapermen's First Amendment protection as announced by the Ninth Circuit, and modify that decision only to provide the absolute protection described above.

Respectfully submitted.

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

Pursuant to the written consent of all parties, the organizations listed on the cover submit this brief as amici curiae in support of respondent, Earl Caldwell ("Caldwell").

While representatives of the print and electronic media, as fellow amici curiae, are submitting in separate briefs their views of the issues presented by this case, particularly with regard to the newsman's qualified or unqualified privilege not to testify or appear before a Grand Jury, these amici, as groups representing many millions of American citizens of all faiths, ethnic and economic backgrounds, and organizations serving racial and religious minorities, wish to present to this Court what they see as the paramount issue—the protection of freedom of expression for all of our people, guaranteed by the First Amendment to the Constitution to encourage communication among the citizenry and thereby bring about a better society.

The Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ conducts a ministry in mass communication in behalf of the Church, a denomination formed in 1957 by merger of two historic Protestant denominations—the Congregational Christian Churches and the Evangelical and Reformed Church. In recent years, the Office of Communication has carried on community action programs to encourage broadcasters to serve minority needs, to maintain equal employment opportunity programs, and to provide full coverage of controversial issues of public importance in their service areas.[1]

The United Church Board for Homeland Ministries is the instrumentality of the United Church of Christ established to handle domestic mission programs. For more than a century, the Board has supported higher education for minorities, including six predominantly black colleges in the southern part of the United States. It is also engaged in voter registration, voter education, race relations and emploment programs and other community activities on behalf of minorities.[2]

The Commission for Racial Justice is an instrumentality created by the United Church of Christ to help secure the legal rights of minorities, to give them a voice in community affairs, to assist them to get education, and to combat racism within the Church.

The Division of Television, Radio and Film Communications of the Program Council of the United Methodist Church works for the denomination in mass media. The General Conference of the United Methodist Church, the denomination's policy making body, acted in 1968 on freedom of expression: "We affirm our adherence on the principle of freedom of expression as a right of every person." The United Methodist Church has a membership of 10,842,000 persons throughout the United States.

The Board of National Missions of the United Presbyterian Church in the United States is the instrumentality of the church charged by its General Assembly to act on social issues. It has a specific mandate to work in problems involving mass communications in this country, and has been particularly active in promoting racial justice.

The American Jewish Committee was incorporated by Act of the Legislature of the State of New York in 1911. Although the chief reason for being of this organization is to prevent the infraction of the civil and religious rights of Jews, the American Jewish Committee has from its very inception been devoted to the preservation of the rights and liberties of Americans of all faiths. It is deeply concerned, therefore, with maintaining the integrity of freedom of the press, as enshrined in the First Amendment, as a traditional bulwark of American liberty.

The African Methodist Episcopal, Zion Church is a predominantly black denomination with 4500 churches and a national membership of 940,000 persons. It is an independent body formed in 1796 after a withdrawal from the John Street Methodist Church of New York City.

The African Methodist Episcopal Church began in 1787 in Philadelphia when persons in St. George Methodist Episcopal Church withdrew as a protest against color segregation. The denomination started in 1816 and today continues to work for racial equality on behalf of its primarily black membership.

The National Council of Churches is an agency of Protestant and Greek Orthodox communions in the United States, which together have a total membership of about 42,000,000 persons. Its member communions have charged the N.C.C. "to study and to speak and act on conditions and issues in the nation and the world which involve moral, ethical, and spiritual principles inherent in the Christian gospel." The Broadcasting and Film Commission is a department in the Central Division of Communication within the National Council of Churches. It has a Board of Managers which determines policy in communication matters within the purposes of the National Council of Churches.

BACKGROUND

The news media in the United States today have pervaded our culture to a degree unmatched by any other social institution. There exist some 750 daily newspapers; 575 Sunday papers; more than 8,000 weekly newspapers; more than 22,000 periodicals, including nearly 150 magazines of "general editorial" content. Americans are able to choose programming content from among 4,200 AM and 2,200 FM radio stations, and from more than 840 television stations. Approximately 95% of American homes include at least one television set, and nearly all at least one radio.[3] Notwithstanding the pervasiveness of such mass communication in the United States, a Media Task Force, in its Report to the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence in November, 1969, pointed out that a serious communications gap stretched wide between the black and white communities in the United States. The Report stated that:

[2] The activities of the instrumentalities of the United Church of Christ are typical of those of the other Protestant denominations appearing as amici. In the interest of brevity, detailed discussion of each of these amici's programs has been omitted.

> "Much of the antipathy of militant blacks toward the white news media centers on the unwillingness of the press to explore the nature of black power in depth. In reporting on the advocates of black pride or black power, the news organizations have shown a greater willingness to accept the radical statements and simply to repeat them than to explore their significance and to place them in proper perspective."[4]

The consequent misrepresentation, confusion and lack of knowledge about black and minority peoples in this country is understandable, but not inevitable.

> "The press functions not only to survey, but also to criticize, and responsible criticism has understanding as its prerequisite. If the media do not make the effort to understand the black community, they cannot intelligently criticize it. If they do not criticize, they are abdicating another of their obligations to the people. But criticism without understanding becomes a hit-or-miss proposition and leads to black animosity toward the media and a consequent drying up of news sources. Yet, much of the sting from critical editorials lessens if the subject of the editorial believes he has had at least a fair opportunity to be understood."[5]

The corollary of this belief is a pervasive mistrust, creating a "dilemma" which has been described as "a widening gap between human needs and public resources and a growing cynicism regarding the commitment of community institutions and leaders to meet these needs."[6]

In further outlining the failure of the mass media to achieve intergroup communication, the Media Task Force Report went on to say:

> "But the impact of the of the imagined slights can be reduced if the media initiate, and the black community responds to, a closer association between the reporters and their black news sources."[7]

Daily events in America today, including riots in our prisons, on our campuses and in our cities indicate that a failure of communication and absence of regular contacts with minority group citizens prevent state and city leaders and agency administrators from learning about problems and grievances as they develop. As a result, tensions which could have been dissipated if responded to promptly, mount unnecessarily, and often culminate in unnecessary violence and death. The development of closer and more frequent contacts was suggested by the Media Task Force. It called for "the kind of regular surveillance of minority group activities which . . . [the media] . . . applies to other segments of the community," the training and "use of ghetto 'stringers' " and "[m]ore background and in-depth stories dealing with facets of the American scene with which the majority of the audience have little experience."[8]

Routinized contacts with the press are needed to help minorities develop the talents necessary to tell their own story to the public.

> "Many organizations, both political and private, exploit the news media to achieve their particular ends. More white organizations than black know how to prepare and distribute a press release, know whom to contact if they have a story they want told, know how to present a story they want told, know how to present a story to the news organization, know what deadlines must be met, and know the terms on which they can deal with the news media. Because of the heritage of segregation and the past practice of the white press to ignore blacks, however, this kind of public relations capability has not developed in the black community to the same extent that it has in the > white community. Yet the media rely on such efforts by non-media organizations. Black coverage deserves the same advantages."[9]

In its chapter concerning "The Marketplace Myth: Access To the Mass Media," the Task Force Report makes its most significant statement, particularly relevant to the case presented here. It states:

> "In 1790, The United States had a total of eight daily newspapers and 8 weeklies. When the Constitution was adopted, 97 percent of the population lived in places so small that they were not even called towns. Of the remaining three percent, most lived in towns whose populations were under 25,000—most only a few thousand. Under these conditions, the individual could make his opinions known by giving a speech on Sunday outside the local church or by getting a printer to put up a broadside and by posting it in taverns and in other public gathering spots around town. With relative ease he could have an impact."[10]

Technological change has diluted the power of the soapbox orator. Once, it was possible to garner the "benefits from press freedom without . . . owning printing plants or running newspapers. . . . Early newspapers were primarily collections of letters written by citizens who did not share at all in the ownership of the publications for which they wrote."[11]

"Today, unless the individual has access to formal channels of communication, it is almost impossible for him to have an impact."[12] His power, according to Federal Communications Commissioner Nicholas Johnson, is measured "in terms of access to the mass media."[13]

> "His ability to communicate widely is extremely limited. As a minimum, an effective marketplace requires access on approximately equal terms by all those with messages. Long ago, perhaps, a newspaper might have been started with relatively little capital by one whose views were strong enough to demand that they be aired. Even today, it is probably possible to blanket a city the size of Washington, D.C., with a four-page broadside for about $1,500. Sometimes, television, radio, and newspaper advertising space can be purchased to carry a non-commercial message. These are communication outlets, but obviously they are not available to all; for many, they would be less than adequate.
> "Access to the American public for the message bearer is limited by both mechanical and human constraints. Present mechanical limitations of the media make it impossible for more than a fraction of the potential communications to be carried to society at large. Existing newspapers, magazines, radio and television stations, and other media in this country could not possibly simultaneously accommodate the individual views of the 125 million Americans over the age of eighteen. Obviously, there is neither sufficient space nor time.
> "Mechanical limitations lead to human limitations. Because the media cannot carry all of the messages, someone must select and reject. The process of selection thus becomes a limitation of critical importance, and the media owners and gatekeepers are the first barriers to media access.
> "Under the traditional view of the First Amendment, the role of the gatekeeper and the right of the owner to choose, are plenary. It makes no difference whether the choice is representative or honest, or whether it meets the public's requirements for information.
> "The nation's broadcasters, publishers, and editors decide who shall have the opportunity to be heard—an understandable and pragmatically necessary process. But, with the present structure of the communication business, it results in a marketplace far different from the 18th century concept of a marketplace for ideas. The ultimate barrier to communication is, of course, the audience. The significance of that barrier depends in part on how media operators choose to present the news. That the media print or broadcast a

The Statement of this case presented in the Brief for the United States has one very serious omission. Although the Government refers to the rash of threats by Black Panthers against the President of the United States preceding and coincident with the publication of an article by respondent Caldwell about the Black Panther Party published on December 14, 1969, in The New York Times, the Statement does not refer to the many years of oppression of the black people in the United States preceding these events, the frustration of minority groups in this country in striving to obtain a modicum of economic achievement and security, the broad gap in communication between the black and white communities, or the problems of the Black Panther Party in adequately presenting its views of the American people.

America in the 1960's was a place of violence. A President had been assassinated, as well as a revered leader of the black people. Whole sections of our cities had been destroyed as a result of racial and political unrest. Presidential commissions were established to seek some answers to the problems of civil disorder, crime, political uprising and civil disobedience, as well as the causes and prevention of violence. Against this background, it is a matter of historical fact that during the later 1960's the Black Panther Party had refused to provide information or grant interviews to many of the reporters who sought to inquire behind its official front. Earl Caldwell, a black staff reporter for The New York Times, was able over a period of several months to develop a close relationship with Party officers and members in the Los Angeles, California, area. As a result of this relationship, the officers and members of the Black Panther Party were able to convey to Caldwell information which he developed into a number of stories published in The New York Times dealing with various aspects of the organization. When Caldwell, who had continued to report on the Black Panthers, was called, in March, 1970, to testify before a Federal Grand Jury investigating the Party, he refused to appear and testify, claiming that his very appearance at the secret proceedings would be interpreted by the Black Panthers "as a possible disclosure of confidences and trusts" which would destroy the confidential relationship established by him over a period of time and his effectiveness as a newspaperman. Notwithstanding the protective order issued by the District Court in denying Caldwell's motion to quash the subpoena served upon him, Caldwell continued to refuse to appear before the Grand Jury for the same reasons, and he was found in contempt. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded with instructions that the order directing Caldwell's appearance before the Grand Jury be vacated. The Court of Appeals held:

> "If any competing public interest is ever to arise in a case such as this (where First Amendment liberties are threatened by mere appearance at a Grand Jury investigation) it will be on an occasion in which the witness,

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The process through which new or unpopular ideas are accepted or rejected by the American public depends on free and frequent exposure to public scrutiny. Such access turns on the ability of reporters to gain the confidence of those who harbor these ideas. Only when there is mutual trust and confidence can the source "open up" to a reporter and freely express his life history of thoughts, fears, hopes and dreams. When this state of open exchange is achieved, a good reporter can translate his source's words into language which his readers can understand and from which they can learn.

Those advocating change use demonstrations, boycotts, marches, public assemblies and other activities which skirt the border of First Amendment protections. Prosecution often follows. The effectiveness of protest as a tool of social change depends on cooperation with the press. If the press are forced to become police informers, the members of such groups will be forced into a hopeless dilemma, either to so limit their contact with the press as to cut off effective communication with their countrymen or to summon the witnesses against themselves and give the testimony which may cause their incarceration.

Seen in this context, the compulsion of reporters' testimony contravenes the First Amendment guarantee to those harboring unpopular thoughts. Stripped of anonymity and privacy, and legitimately fearing misinterpretation; declarants such as the Black Panthers will forfeit their opportunity to speak fully rather than risk the consequences of frank conversation with reporters who might later be subpoenaed.

The make-up and nature of the Grand Jury further intimidates political or social dissidents into silence—or worse. The secrecy of this prosecutorial body adds uncertainty to the reporter-informant relationship. A source can never be sure of the unintended uses to which his disclosures may be put. The most sincere promises of confidentiality are rendered moot by the slamming of the Grand Jury door. Furthermore, the conditions of Grand Jury testimony—no counsel present, isolation and powerful, locally prominent interrogators—magnify the fear that reporters will "break down" and reveal the most personal confidences.

The ultimate loser in this process is the American public. Deprived of desperately needed original source material, the public must draw conclusions by inference from misleading secondary data. Escalation of misunderstanding into open—and, sometimes, violent—conflict is the inevitable byproduct of incomplete exchange of ideas.

ARGUMENT

(Point I)

The first amendment to the Constitution requires protection of the public's freedom of expression.

In determining the meaning of the first amendment rights of freedom of speech and freedom of the press, this Court has recognized that it is not the carrier of the idea that is paramount in our democratic system, but the idea itself, whatever its popularity or unpopularity, and whether or not those who set forth such ideas reveal themselves to the public or choose to remain anonymous. In speaking of the purpose of the first amendment, this Court has recently indicated that it is "to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail, rather than to countenance monopolization of that market, whether it be by the Government itself or a private licensee." [15] The right to engage in free expression of ideas takes precedence over any rights of those who may be licensed to disseminate the ideas so that the dissemination is at all times protected and fostered. "It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here." [16]

The right to engage in political expression, even though remaining anonymous, is just as well enshrined in the First Amendment.[17]

Accordingly, while respondent Caldwell claimed to be utilizing his "newspaperman's privilege" as a basis for refusing to appear before the Grand Jury investigating the Black Panther Party, even under a qualified protective order, what he was in fact doing was protecting the freedom of expression right of the Black Panther Party's officers and members with whom he had talked and whose statements had served as a basis for his articles in The New York Times. Those officers and members must be assumed to have believed at the time that they communicated with Caldwell that their First Amendment rights were guaranteed by the Constitution, that they could speak freely to Caldwell, a member of the press, not only about their specific activities and their expected actions, but about their own lives, their communities, their people and anything else they thought might be relevant and to afford Caldwell the opportunity to prepare an accurate report of a large segment of the American people. This information allowed Caldwell to write as he did and afforded the American public greater insight into the Black Panther Party, but most of all it permitted the officers and members of the Black Panther Party to utilize effectively their freedom of expression. It permitted Caldwell to take confidential material, as well as material that his sources might have deemed non-confidential but which they would never have expressed if they knew it might be related elsewhere, and to shape such facts into informative stories. In short, it is the public right to know which is ultimately at stake here.

This Court, in Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60, recognized the interest of society in anonymous publications and struck down an ordinance requiring that all handbills bear the name of the sponsors, authors or distributors, where the State had advanced no sufficient governmental interest in the regulation, saying:

> "There can be no doubt that such an identification requirement did and would continue to restrict freedom to distribute information and thereby freedom of expression." [18]

It certainly must follow that if persons wishing to submit ideas and information to the media know that the person to whom they may communicate such ideas and information may be required to appear before a Grand Jury without any governmental demonstration of a compelling need of the witness' presence, the person holding the idea or information has had placed upon him a restriction of his freedom of expression. Such an inhibition must of itself be violative of the Constitution.

Certainly it is difficult to ascertain to what extent there may be an inhibition on the part of issuers of ideas and information to reveal such solely because there may be an awareness that the reporter may be called into a Grand Jury room, even though he may only be required to testify as to "non-confidential" material or may not testify at all. Empirical studies on this are unavailable. However, the record in this case is replete with affidavits of media personnel including some of our most renowned reporters, indicating the chilling effect they believe such actions may have on those who might otherwise give free expression to their ideas and information. Balanced against the apparent lack of significant inconvenience to the government caused by the requirement that it show an interest prior to Caldwell's appearance, it would seem obvious that such opinions must be given greater credence in support of the paramount interest of freedom of expression.

This Court put the matter well in the recent case of Cohen v. California, in which it said:

> "The constitutional right of free expression is powerful medicine in a society as diverse and populous as ours. It is designed and intended to remove governmental restraints from the arena of public discussion, putting the decision as to what views shall be voiced largely into the hands of each of us, in the hope that use of such freedom will ultimately produce a more perfect polity and in the belief that no other approach would comport with the premise of individual dignity and choice upon which our political system rests. See Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357, 375–377, 47 S.Ct. 641, 648–649, 71 L.Ed. 1095 (1927) (concurring opinion of Brandeis, J.)."[19]

The Government argues that the basis for Caldwell's refusal to appear before the Grand Jury may be linked with some form of "paranoia" on the part of the Black Panthers, or from "mere speculation" that they and other dissident groups, solely as a reaction against the reporter's appearance, will refrain from exercising protected expression. We submit that this terrible social reaction to the harassing tactics of governmental agencies cannot be so simply discounted. It would appear that to insure their constitutional rights, dissident groups must openly state that such is their fear before their rights are guaranteed. This Court has clearly indicated that this is not a requirement, saying:

> "Under our Constitution, free speech is not a right that is given only to be so circumscribed that it exists in principle but not in fact. Freedom of expression would not truly exist if the right could be exercised only in an area that a benevolent government has provided as a safe haven for crackpots. The Constitution says that Congress (and the States) may not abridge the right to free speech. This provision means what it says. We properly read it to permit reasonable regulation of speech-connected activities in carefully restricted circumstances. But we do not confine the permissible exercise of First Amendment rights to a telephone booth or the four corners of a pamphlet, or to supervised and ordained discussion in a school classroom."[20]

One of the most interesting comments made in the Task Force Report, although referring to the black-white relationship, would seemingly have applicability to all of our racial and religious groups. It says:

> "The only way the white media can hope to understand the black community is by becoming involved in the black community. . . . The white community cannot listen unless someone carries the message, a message based on understanding the black man."[21]

The Task Force Report refers to significant questions proposed by a former member of the Justice Department's Community Relations Service:

> "Have you ever wondered what it's like to be seven years old, and black, in a slum school? Have you ever tried to find out how a young, unskilled Negro husband tries to provide for his family? Have you ever thought about the aspirations of a Negro teenager? Do you know what soul food is? What do you know about the myriad of block clubs and organizations in the ghetto community? What really goes on in ghetto pool rooms? Do attitudes of Negro youngsters about sex differ from those of whites? What is the meaning of the ritual of those storefront churches? What does a young Negro father tell his son about being Black in America? Why are there seemingly so many taverns in Negro neighborhoods? What are the latest in-group jokes in the ghetto? There is a fascinating world of humor, pathos, aspirations, frustrations, toil, heartbreak, violence, and joy right under your nose."[22]

What is made clear is that in these troubled times these are questions that news organizations must know the answers to so that they can perform their jobs properly. The public reading or viewing the media must be aware of these answers. But most important of all, the black community must be able to fully express their ideas and give forth information to provide these answers. Perhaps then we will not have such a significant gap between our respective communities. Perhaps then, with greater understanding, violence in our nation will be reduced.

Earl Caldwell, though black himself, was writing for a predominantly white-controlled newspaper and for a largely white readership. He wanted to express the thoughts of a segment of the black community, and he believed that he had reached a point of such confidence that he could fully do so. He was not an agent of the Government and the Black Panthers knew this. Perhaps in some way he was instrumental in diminishing the intergroup communications gap. If he felt that going into the Grand Jury room without any showing of compelling need for his presence would inhibit his activities, clearly his position was correctly honored. What Caldwell did and what others after him may do in the same vein was and will be to foster the expression of ideas and to reduce the level of violence in our society, but in any event to bring about its advancement in some manner.

The obligation of members of the press not to appear before a Grand Jury pursuant to subpoena without the showing by the Government of a compelling need is not just the privilege of the newspaperman. The newspaperman is recognizing the constitutional right of the public when he refuses to make such an appearance. Those with whom he may have a relationship could never waive the "privilege." Thus this case may not present the question of whether or not a newspaperman's "privilege" should be qualified or unqualified.[23] The issue presented here is whether or not there is a restriction of the freedom of expression of members of the public where a newspaperman is required to appear before a Grand Jury without a demonstration by the Government of a compelling need where information is sought concerning the newspaperman's knowledge gained through his relationship of confidence with those members of the public. Viewed in this perspective, the issue, therefore, is not so much one of how much of a reduction of the flow of information to the public might occur as a result of compelled presence in the Grand Jury room as it is of how much of an inhibition there will be on the part of the public to express themselves, through the media, to other members of the public. Obviously, if there is an inhibition at one end of the flow of ideas and information, there would have to be a resultant reduction at the other end. Although the issues may become clouded in referring to questions of divulging sources of information, degrees of privilege, or breaches of confidences, that does not appear to be the case at hand. Most essential is the matter of actual loss to the public of information because compelled appearance by reporters reduce a confidant's likelihood of communicating through the press. Clearly, some information will be communicated even in the absence of any "privilege." Many of those who are the sources of information would prefer that their identities or certain information not intended for the public remain confidential; they are willing to rely for confidentiality on the possibility that the reporter will never be subpoenaed to testify or, if subpoenaed on the likelihood that the reporter would suffer a contempt citation before testifying. But as a matter of contitutional law, what the sources of information may or may not do may depend upon a qualified or unqualified newsman's privilege not to appear before a Grand Jury.

It must be recognized that there may be a conflict between governmental and private interests, and the Court below recognized and difficulty in striking the appropriate balance between these interests. Finding that compelling disclosures would restrict the flow of information to the public, the Court adopted the District Court's requirement that Caldwell need not testify unless the Government could show a "compelling and overriding national interest" in his testimony. The District Court had said:

> "When the exercise of the Grand Jury power of testimonial compulsion so necessary to the effective functioning of the Court may impinge upon or replace the First Amendment rights of freedom of speech, press, and association . . . such power shall not be exercised in a manner likely to do so until there has been a clear showing of a compelling and overriding national interest that cannot be served by any alternative means."[24]

Although the Court did not make clear just what kind of governmental interest would satisfy the requirement, this Court did appear to have outlined the standard in clear language in United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, in which it said:

> "This Court has held that when 'speech' and 'non-speech' elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest can justify incidental limitations on First Amendment freedoms. To characterize the quality of the governmental interest which must > appear, the Court has employed a variety of descriptive terms: compelling; substantial; subordinating; paramount; cogent; strong. Whatever impression inheres in these terms, we think it clear that a government regulation is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the Government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest: if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest." (emphasis supplied) [25]

Most significant is the requirement that the governmental interest be unrelated to the suppression of free expression. It would seem, therefore, that in cases where the Government wishes to require a newspaperman to appear before a Grand Jury with respect to any inquiry concerning communications between him and sources of information, the "compelling need" of the witness' presence must be evidenced so strongly as to show that the restriction on First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest. Clearly, the Government did not make such a showing in the Court below.

(Point II)

Because of the Grand Jury's composition, function, procedure and atmosphere, the action of this body in questioning Caldwell would have a chilling effect on freedom of speech.

While the effectiveness of the Grand Jury system in our democratic society must be recognized, as with all things there are rare occasions when even such effective instruments become the tool of those who may wish to use them for improper purposes, and thus power is abused. In referring to the power of the Grand Jury system, this Court has stated:

> "Doubtless abuses of this power may be imagined . . . (b)ut were such abuses called to the attention of the court, it would doubtless be alert to repress them." [26]

Little use has been made of this power to control the Grand Jury system, however, but this would seem to be an appropriate instance for the utilization of such repression.

Historically, the purpose of the Grand Jury was to stand as a buffer between the citizen and the government. It was never supposed to perform executive functions; it is, rather, a mechanism to protect the people from abuse of the sovereign power. All too often it appears, in the eyes of its targets, to be an instrument used to attack the fundamental rights of an entire class. This is, in large measure, a result of the composition of the Grand Jury. Selection practices for Grand Juries vary, of course, according to jurisdiction. Nevertheless, a nationwide pattern is discernible: Grand Juries are made up of a small-self selected and unrepresentative elite.[27]

Far from protecting the accused's rights, these groups tend to be unknowledgeable about the problems of one likely to be arrested. Rather than identifying with the accused, these jurors are likely to consider him an enemy and are likely to develop a defensive attitude towards the efforts of a demonstrator or political dissident whose case is brought before them.

For example, in New York,

> "grand jury service, unlike petit jury service, was entirely voluntary. Citizens were invited rather than summoned to participate. Solicitations to place one's name on the grand jury list, which in 1964 numbered approximately 2,000, were periodically mailed to persons selected at random from the county petit jury list. In 1964, however, no grand jury invitations were sent to potential petit jurors under 35 years of age, or over 65. . . . It

[26] Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 65.

[27] Although the 1968 Jury Selection and Service Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1861 et seq. applies uniform and random selection methods to Federal grand and petit juries, this does not mean that the criterion now used—voter registration—will yield representative panels. Historic patterns of intimidation of would-be voting registrants have not stopped. Congress has been compelled to extend the special protections of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. § 1973 et seq. for a second 5-year period. 42 U.S.C. § 1973 aa. See H.R. Rep. No. 397, 91st Cong., 2d sess. (1970). Minorities who do not register out of fear or despair are underrepresented even on Federal panels. Furthermore, no such reform has been undertaken in the various States whose Grand Juries would be affected by the outcome of the instant case.

> was, . . . the practice to exclude welfare recipients from both grand and petit jury service.[28]
> The names of persons accepted as grand jurors were then added to the grand jury list in the next annual cumulation . . . (T)he grand juror selection system resulted in the underrepresentation, when compared with the general population, of certain ethnic and economic groups. Thus, blacks comprised 1.65% of persons on the grand juror list from which the Second August 1964 Grand Jury was selected, although at the time approximately 24% of the total population of New York County between 21 and 70 years of age was black.[29] Puerto Ricans comprised 0.3% of the jury list, compared with approximately 12% of the population. 'Blue collar workers'—a loose classification based on petitioners' own statistical analysis—comprised 1.2%[30] compared with 47% of the New York County labor force."[31]

A California study showed that:

> "Fifty-one percent of the nominees were personal friends of the judges who nominated them. Another 42 percent were either professional acquaintances, fellow members of a social or service group, or recommended by a friend of the judge. The addresses of the nominees were clustered around the addresses of the judges in the more affluent areas of the county. Few of the nominees were selected from areas where minority groups were concentrated. Less than 5 percent of the nominees were Negroes or Mexican-Americans, who make up more than 35 percent of the county's population.
> Sixty-seven percent of the nominees were in occupations classified as professional, technical, managerial or proprietary, while only 23 percent of the county's work force was engaged in these occupations. There were no clerical personnel, skilled craftsmen or unskilled workers among the nominees, while these occupational groups made up 62% of the county's work force. The educational level of the nominees matched their occupational level; 74% had college backgrounds, with 20% having advanced degrees or some graduate work.
> Grand jury nominees tended to be predominantly middle-age and older persons. Forty-one percent of the nominees were over 65 years of age, while 48% were from 45 to 64 years of age. Only 11% of the nominees were below the age of 45, and none of these were under 35.
> In . . . [another case] . . . which attacked the grand jury as discriminatory against Spanish-surnamed persons, data was introduced to show that while Spanish-surnamed individuals made up 12.4% of the county's residents, only 1.3% of the grand jury nominees for a 10 year period from 1959–68 were of Spanish surname. Out of 1,501 total nominations during that time period, only twenty were Spanish-surnamed individuals, and eight of these nominations were by a single judge.
> . . . Generally, the judges' efforts, if any, to find qualified minority group persons consisted of asking a Negro or Mexican-American legislator, judge or bailiff whether he had any names to suggest."[32]

The Grand Juror and the minority newspaper informant, then, tend to come from different backgrounds and represent antithetical interests. Amici submit that the more intense the conflict in a jurisdiction, the more threatened the juror will feel. As the preceding section has explained, the gaps in understanding of the two groups are great, and even the most earnest attempt to understand another person's perspective is likely to fail. Destroying the newsman's relations with his informants can only complicate the problem.

Traditionally, the Grand Jury has been seen as a check on overzealous prosecutors. This historic role provided the title for Richard Younger's book length study, The People's Panel (1963). However, this role has been increasingly reversed during the twentieth century. Judge Melvin P. Antell of the Essex County District Court (New Jersey) described the typical Grand Jury practice in the American Bar Association Journal:

[28] This practice, like the exclusion of potential jurors who were under 35 years of age, had no statutory basis, and was subsequently terminated.

[29] Negroes comprised 14 percent of the population between 35 and 65 with at least a high school education. All population statistics were based upon the 1960 census.

[30] Occupational statistics were gathered from the 1966 cumulation of the grand jury list.

"Though free to take part in the interrogation, the grand jurors must place enormous trust in the prosecutor's guidance. It is he, after all, who tells them what the charge is, who selects the facts for them to hear, who shapes the tone and feel of the entire case. It is the prosecutor alone who has the technical training to understand the legal principles upon which the prosecution rests, where individual liberty begins and ends, the evidential value of available facts and the extent to which notice may be taken of proposed evidence.

"In short, the only person who has a clear idea of what is happening in the Grand Jury room is the public official whom these twenty-three novices are expected to check. So that even if a grand jury were disposed to assert its historic independence in the interest of an individual's liberty, it must, paradoxically look to the very person whose misconduct they are supposed to guard against for guidance as to when he is acting oppressively.

"Actually, the concern of protecting the individual from wrongful prosecution is one about which grand juries in general show little interest . . .

"Thus, when a case is brought into the grand jury room the prevailing feeling is that the prosecutor wouldn't bring it there if he didn't think he could get a conviction . . ."[33]

In reality, then, the Grand Jury uses no initiative, exerts little independence and functions in an automatic, ministerial manner.[34] Stripped of its protective role, the Grand Jury is vulnerable to misuse by overzealous prosecutors.

Racial and religious minorities are among the first to fall victim to such abuses of power. As veterans of the Civil Rights movement, they have learned to fear the use of Grand Juries to obtain evidence about "offenses" which border upon—and often transgress into—constitutionally protected areas. Unfortunately, reporters are viewed as excellent witnesses to testify in investigations which rely heavily on oral evidence to show intent—those involving charges such as conspiracy, incitement to riot, breach of the peace, trespassing and the like. It is precisely this kind of prosecution which deprives the reporters' informant of his protected platform.

The conditions of Grand Jury testimony also serve to destroy the sense of trust needed to encourage frank discussion. The very tools which are said to provide the strength of the Grand Jury system—immunity powers, no counsel present, "prominent" community leaders, not to mention secrecy, provide a basis for legitimate concern when reporters are witnesses. A body of men (and occasionally, women) with a financial and emotional stake in the status quo, and which is subject to the unchecked influence of a prosecuting attorney is, in some circumstances, likely to drive a wedge between them and the reporters who usually carry their message.

An inherently unfair match is set up when the layman-reporter enters the Grand Jury room without counsel. Unlike his antagonist, the reporter may have no foreknowledge of the questions to be asked of him. He may not even be sure if he himself is under suspicion. Sitting across from powerful community leaders who may be friendly with his editor or publisher, the reporter is likely to feel strong pressure to reveal information especially if it seems innocuous. Under these conditions, an informant, who can never be certain about what the reporter will be forced to discuss, would be ill-advised to speak freely, the Bill of Rights notwithstanding.

The likelihood of abuse varies according to time and region. A specific event or a spectacular crime may trigger an emotionally outraged investigation. Or a single individual or group harboring a prejudice or a grudge may systematically misuse the Grand Jury. The constitutional protection of free expression is directed at these anomalies. Only by establishment of a privilege for a news source's revelations can there be adequate safeguards.

The record below contains numerous references to the use of the Grand Jury system in 1970 by the Government to carry out a systematic investigation into organizations in the United States, particularly in the black community. Even the Government points out in its Brief (p. 47) that while this litigation was underway, the Attorney General of the United States was required to take steps to minimize the possibility that this issue would reoccur in a Federal context, and that the Attorney General issued guidelines which are to govern the practices of the Department of Justice in summoning newsmen before Grand Juries in the future.

While we submit that the matter of protection of freedom of expression is the paramount issue in this case, it is clear that the power of the Grand Jury was exceeded by the Department of Justice with respect to the subpoena issued to Caldwell, and that this Court, having had such abuse called to its attention, must repress such an abuse by affirming the decision of the Court of Appeals.

For the reasons stated, the Judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit should be affirmed.

THE INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

In United States v. Caldwell, No. 70-57, the United States brought before this Court the narrow question whether, assuming that a newspaper reporter is privileged to withhold information from a grand jury which he obtained confidentially in the process of newsgathering, the privilege would extend so far as to bar a grand jury, in the absence of a preliminary showing of particularized need, from calling the reporter to testify about matters not received in confidence, when the reporter, in published articles, has set forth information of obvious interest to the grand jury. It is our position there that, whatever may be the nature and scope of the newsman's privilege, it does not render a reporter immune from the necessity of at least appearing before a grand jury in response to a subpoena ad testificandum which has been limited by court order to matters that are of a non-confidential nature.

These cases present broader questions. In Pappas, where petitioner was allowed to visit the headquarters of the Black Panthers on the promise that he would not disclose what he heard or saw unless there was a police raid, the question presented is whether, in the absence of a statute, a reporter has a privilege to withhold from a grand jury investigating criminal acts information as to what he saw and heard during his visit. In Branzburg, where the reporter described and photographed the commission of a crime—the production of hashish—the constitutional question[1] is whether a reporter has a First Amendment privilege to withhold from a grand jury facts ascertained from his personal observation of the crime.

Whether a reporter's privilege is implicit in the First Amendment guarantee of a free press, and, if so, the scope of such privilege, are matters which concern the United States as well as the states. While, as a matter of policy, the Attorney General has issued guidelines designed to minimize friction between the prosecution and the news media,[2] it is important for the Executive and the Congress to know the extent of their responsibilities under the Constitution in this field. It is our basic position that the question whether there should be a reporter's privilege, and the extent of such privilege, is for Congress rather than for the courts, and that it is to the legislature, rather than to this Court, that the news media should address their arguments.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The claim of privilege by reporters and journalists is not new. It has been advanced repeatedly in the courts, in Congress, in state legislatures and before various rulemaking committees. It has been analogized to the traditional privileges at common law, proposed as a rule of evidence, and urged as a constitutional right implicit in the First Amendment guarantee of a free press. With minor exception—most notably in the area of state legislation—the efforts have been to no avail.

[1] In the proceedings below, petitioner Branzburg also relied upon a Kentucky statute (Ky. Rev. Stat. 421.100 (1969)), which extends to newsmen a privilege of non-disclosure as to the source of any published information.

The statute provides: "No person shall be compelled to disclose in any legal proceeding or trial before any court, or before any grand or petit jury, or before the presiding officer of any tribunal, or his agent or agents, or before the General Assembly, or any committee thereof, or before any city or county legislative body, or any committee thereof, or elsewhere, the source of any information procured or obtained by him, and published in a newspaper or by a radio or television broadcasting station by which he is engaged or employed, or with which he is connected."

[2] The Attorney General's Guidelines are set forth in an appendix to our brief on the merits in United States v. Caldwell, No. 70-57, this Term, at pp. 49-51.

The news media have functioned effectively and efficiently in this country for almost two hundred years without a reporter's privilege. Since the early days of the Republic, the newsgathering process has depended in large part on information given to reporters in confidence. Despite the fact that anonymous informants have always been faced with the possibility that some days before some grand jury investigating criminal activity the reporter might be called upon to divulge his sources, the flow of confidential information to the media has increased significantly over the years.

Obviously, the vast majority of such information is unrelated to the fact that news reporters may be called upon to tell what they know about criminal acts. The area of potential clash between law enforcement agencies and the claimed reporter's privilege is a narrow one, confined largely to situations where newsmen have witnessed or may have witnessed events bearing on the commission of a crime. Recognition of a privilege in this area raises far-reaching questions of policy which cannot be adequately answered by such broad phrases as "the right to gather news." The reporters are claiming, not merely the right to gather news, but the right to withhold news on the basis of promises that they, in their sole discretion, make to their informants. This is not so clearly desirable nor so clearly necessary to effective news reporting that the Court should recognize the position of the news media as a matter of constitutional right.

The Attorney General and most states have recognized that this is a delicate area and that it is desirable to interfere as little as possible with the newsgathering activities of the news media. This, however, is different from according to the news media a privilege under the Constitution to be free of the duty imposed on all citizens to give testimony relating to a crime. The past two hundred years demonstrate convincingly that such a privilege is not essential to a meaningful exercise of the protected freedoms of the press to write, to publish, and to circulate the news. Whether or not it is desirable is a different question altogether. But, the desirability of according a privilege to news reporters and the scope of such a privilege are matters that should be left to the legislative process; it is, therefore, to the legislature, rather than to this Court, that the news media should address their arguments.

ARGUMENT

Whether or not the protection of a newsman's confidential associations is desirable as a matter of policy, there is no reporter's privilege as a matter of First Amendment right

1. The question before the Court in these cases is not, as the briefs of the petitioners and of the news media seem to assume, whether it is desirable for news reporters to have the privilege of withholding from grand juries and law enforcement authorities information which the reporters believe was received in confidence, even if such information relates to the commission of a crime. The issue presented here is a very different one: whether recognition of such a privilege is so essential to the existence of a free press that newsmen must be deemed to have that privilege as of right under the First Amendment. Unless that is so, questions relating to a claimed reporters' privilege are not issues for the courts, but for the legislative process.

Despite the efforts of respected news reporters, in the affidavits carefully prepared for the Caldwell case, to suggest that failure to recognize their claimed privilege as implicit in the First Amendment will result in the demise of a free press, the fact remains that the newsgathering process has functioned effectively and efficiently in this country for almost two hundred years without benefit of the special protections sought in these cases. It has, of course, long been recognized that many newsworthy stories would never have reached the public if the sources had been unable to rely on anonymity. Almost forty years ago, this point was made as forcefully as it is today (Siebert and Ryniker, Editor and Publisher, September 1, 1934, pp. 36–37):

> News channels which prove valuable in unearthing such examples of public scandals remain so only as long as the source remains secret. Honest officials, and occasionally dishonest persons, who can furnish necessary information cannot afford to jeopardize their freedom or their jobs by permitting their names to be used. * * * No information would be given if the informant did not have faith in the integrity of the reporter in the matter of withholding his name. The newspaper man would find his channels of news closed.

But, notwithstanding the Ninth Circuit's recent decision in Caldwell, the possibility that some day before some grand jury investigating criminal activity the reporter might be called upon to divulge his source of information—a possibility that has existed since the early days of the Republic—has apparently not in the past deterred the anonymous informant from communicating with the news media. As revealed by a 1968 study of all major newspapers in the United States, an "absolutely staggering" number of news stories are developed from information given to reporters in confidence. Guest and Stanzler, The Constitutional Argument for Newsmen Concealing Their Sources, 64 Nw. U. L. Rev. 18, 43–44, 60 (1969).

2. Obviously, news reporters obtain all sorts of confidential information, from personal gossip to opinions on affairs of state, which will not be affected by the fact that they may be called upon to tell what they know about criminal acts. The area of potential clash between law enforcement agencies and the claimed reporter's privilege is, therefore, a narrow one. It is largely confined, as the cases presently before this Court illustrate, to situations where reporters have witnessed or may have witnessed events which have a bearing on the commission of a crime. Recognition of a privilege in this area raises far-reaching questions of policy, which cannot be adequately answered by the broad generalizations offered by the media.

For example, is a press really free when it deliberately sets out to publicize a crime but refuses to disclose the criminal, as in the Kentucky case? Misprision of a felony is a crime of long standing. See generally 1 Stat. 112, 113; 15A C.J.S. §§ 2(2)–3. Without undertaking to decide whether a reporter who witnesses the crime is guilty of an affirmative act of misprision by refusing to disclose identities, it is clear that his act is violative of the basic principle sustaining that offense—that the state is entitled to the tesimony of all men with knowledge of facts disclosing crime. Cf. Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591, 600. In the area of relationships with minority and dissident groups, there are also some basic questions which must be considered. Is a press really free when, as in the Massachusetts case, the minority group has it in its power to decide what the public will or will not be told by the conditions it imposes on permitting a reporter access to its headquarters? Is it more important than the press maintain a thread of relationships to such groups by acceding to their conditions, reasonable or unreasonable, or is it more important that the press report what they can manage to find out, untrammeled by the conditions imposed by their informants?

We raise the questions, not to answer them, but to suggest that the question whether there should be a reporter's privilege, and what its scope should be, is not a simple issue capable of resolution by such broad phrases as "the right to gather news." The reporters are claiming, not merely the right to gather news, but the right to withhold news on the basis of promises that they, in their sole discretion, make to their informants.[3] This, we submit, is not so clearly desirable nor so clearly necessary to effective news reporting that the Court should recognize the position of the news media as a matter of constitutional right.

The only privilege recognized by the Constitution is the privilege against self-incrimination (Fifth Amendment). Whether other privileges should exist is a matter to be decided by regular legislative means on the basis of the normal debate and full consideration of competing values that regularly enter into legislation. Some states have enacted statutes governing the newsman's privilege, only a few of them as broad as the privilege claimed in these cases.[4] If the present-day circumstances justify recognition of a privilege of broader scope and of nation-wide coverage, that determination ought to be made by Congress. That body is better suited to the task of developing the scope and limitations of such a privilege in a systematic way than are the courts as a function of interpreting the Constitution.

[3] Petitioners and the news media liken the reporter's privilege to the privilege of the government informer. See Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, 59; McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300. As this Court stated in Roviaro (353 U.S. at 59), however, the informer's privilege "recognizes the obligation of citizens to communicate their knowledge of the commission of crimes to law-enforcement officials and, by preserving their anonymity, encourages them to perform that obligation." By contrast, the claimed reporter's privilege is designed to permit newsmen to withhold from law-enforcement officials their knowledge of criminal activity, and thus has precisely the opposite effect from the privilege accorded to government informers.

For a discussion of the differences in the scope of coverage under these statutes, see Comment. Constitutional Protection for the Newsman's Work Product, 6 Harv. Civ. R.-Civ. Lib. L. 3. At the time that the Founding Fathers drafted the Bill of Rights, the common law recognized no privilege on the part of a news reporter to conceal his source of information or to withhold information received by him in confidence. 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2286 (McNaughton Rev. 1961). Prior to the decision of the Ninth Circuit in Caldwell, courts in this country which have been called upon to recognize such a privilege have, with minor exception,[5] consistently refused to do so. See, e.g., Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545 (C.A. 2), certiorari denied, 358 U.S. 910; Rosenberg v. Carroll, 99 F. Supp. 629 (S.D.N.Y.); Brewster v. Boston Herald-Traveler Corp., 20 F.R.D. 416 (D. Mass.); In re Goodfader's Appeal, 45 Hawaii 317, 367 P. 2d; People ex. rel. Mooney v. Sheriff of New York County, 269 N.Y. 291, 199 N.E. 415.[6] Quite apart from any question as to the aptness of the analogy of the claimed reporter's privilege to the traditional privileges existing for certain personal relationships (i.e., attorney-client, husband-wife, etc.),[7] the fundamental rationale underlying these decisions seems to be a disinclination to limit the duty imposed upon all to attend and give their testimony in a court of law by expanding the class of persons entitled to withhold evidence on the basis of some privilege.[8] See, Garland v. Torre, supra, 259 F. 2d at 550; In re Goodfader's Appeal, supra, 45 Hawaii at 333–335, 367 P. 2d at 482–483. As then Judge Stewart stated in Garland v. Torre, supra, 259 F. 2d at 550:

> The privilege not to disclose relevant evidence obviously constitutes an extraordinary exception to the general duty to testify. Even those few situations to which the law has long accorded this privilege have been seriously questioned. It has been emphasized that the tendency should be "not to extend the classes to whom the privilege from disclosure is granted, but to restrict that privilege." * * * To recognize the privilege asserted here, assuming our power to do so, would poorly serve the cause of justice.

It is only recently that the First Amendment has been offered as a basis for the refusal by newsmen to testify. The decisions in this area appear to go three ways. There are cases which totally reject the claim that the First Amendment prohibits compelling a reporter to disclose a confidential source or information received in confidence. See, e.g., In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193 A. 2d 181; State v. Buchanan, 250 Ore. 244, 436 P. 2d 729, certiorari denied, 392 U.S. 905. Second, there are a group of cases which assume, without so deciding, that disclosure in some circumstances might constitute an infringement of First Amendment rights, but find no First Amendment violation because the interest in disclosure, in the circumstances presented, outweighs any possible impingement on freedom of the press. Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545 (C.A. 2), certiorari denied, 358 U.S. 910; see also State v. Knops, 49 Wis. 2d 647, 183 N.W. 2d 93.[9] Only a few very recent decisions actually decide that compulsory disclosure invariably trenches on the First Amendment freedom of the press and requires that a special showing be made to justify disclosure. See United States v. Caldwell, 434 F. 2d 1081 C.A. 9), pending on certiorari. No. 70–57, this Term: and see cases cited at n. 5, supra. There thus is certainly no general recognition of an overriding need for the claimed reporter's rivilege in order for the media to continue providing the public—as they have or almost two centuries—with "the widest possible dissemination of information rom diverse and antagonistic sources" (Associated Press v. United States, 326 .S. 1, 20).

[8] Disinclination to expand privileges of non-disclosure, even those previously recognized, has been voiced by various commentators. See, e.g., 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2192 at 73, § 2286 at 536 (McNaughton Rev. 1961); Morgan, Foreword, Model Code of Evidence, 22–30 (1942); 2 Chafee, Government and Mass Communications, 495–499 (1947); Note, The Right of a Newsman to Refrain from Divulging the Sources of His Information, 36 Va. [9] The Knops decision is reprinted in our Supplemental Memorandum to the petition for certiorari in United States v. Caldwell, No. 70–57, this Term, certiorari granted, May 1971.

4. That the absence of a privilege has not rendered the press ineffective in athering news is evidenced by its inability yet to convince Congress or a number f state legislatures that the reporter's privilege is essential to a free press in free society.[10] Although bills creating such a privilege have been proposed n several occasions, none has ever emerged from committee.[11] There is presently ending before the Judiciary Committee another bill which provides protection f the newsman's confidential sources and communications. See S. 1311, 92d ong., 1st Sess. (1970). In addition, the Committee on Rules of Evidence is in he process of formulating evidentiary rules for the federal courts.[12] It is in such forum, or in Congress, that the value judgments relating to recognition of a ewsman's privilege should be debated and resolved.

The Attorney General and a number of states have recognized that this is a elicate area, and that it is desirable to interfere as little as possible with the ews-gathering activities of the media (see nn. 2, 4, supra). This, however, is ifferent from according to the news media a privilege under the Constitution to e free of the duty imposed on all citizens to give testimony relating to a crime. The past two hundred years illustrate convincingly that such a privilege is not ecessary to a meaningful exercise of the protected freedoms of the press to rite,[13] to publish[14] and to circulate[15] the news. As Justice Holmes said, speaking f a related type of constitutional problem, in Otis Co. v. Ludlow Manufacturing Co., 201 U.S. 140, 154:

> We are bound to be very cautious in coming to the conclusion that the Fourteenth Amendment has upset what thus has been established and accepted for a long time.

Whether or not such a privilege is desirable is, as stated at the outset, a different question altogether. The desirability of according a privilege to news reporters and the scope of such a privilege are matters, we submit, that should be left to the legislative process.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, the judgments of the Court of Appeals for the Commonwealth of Kentucky in No. 70–85 and the judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in No. 70–94 should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted.

[10] Indeed, on several occasions Congress has, even in the face of an apparent claim of privilege, cited newsmen for contempt for refusing to answer questions before a congressional investigating committee. Thus, in 1857, the House of Representatives appointed a committee to investigate published charges to the effect that members of the House were accepting bribes. A newspaper correspondent, J. W. Simonton, appeared before the committee and refused to disclose names of members whom he claimed had approached him, inquiring whether, through him, they could procure money for their votes on certain bills. His refusal was based on the ground that a disclosure would violate a confidence. See Cong. Globe, 34th Cong., 3d Sess. 274–275, 277, 404. 411–413 (1857). Argument.
    Introduction.
    I. The First Amendment does not compel the designation of broadcast advertising time as a common carrier type forum in which broadcast stations are required to sell announcements to individuals or groups for the presentation of their particular views on public issues.
        A. The Relevant First Amendment Objective is to Guarantee that the Listening and Viewing Public is Not Left Uninformed—Not to Guarantee an Individual Right of Access.
        B. A Finding That Broadcast Operations Are "State Action" Is Fundamentally Inconsistent With the First Amendment Requirements for Broadcasting.
    II. An individualized "right to purchase spot advertisement time on broadcast stations to discuss controversial issues which have been covered in other broadcast programming is fundamentally inconsistent with the system of regulation selected by Congress.

A. A Comprehensive Legislative and Administrative Framework Insures that Broadcast Licensees Serve the Public Interest Through the Presentation of Full and Fair Information on Significant Public Issues.
  1. The Public Trustee Concept Underlying the Statutory Standard Deliberately and Inherently Rejects a Common Carrier Role for Broadcasting.
  2. Developments In Administrative Interpretation and Statutory Amendment Demonstrate the Viability of the Public Trustee System.
III. The decision of the Court of Appeals will substantially impede the performance of a licensee's public trustee role, diminish the exercise of a broadcaster's journalistic discretion, and increase governmental control of broadcast speech.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was entered on August 3, 1971 (App. 492). Petitions for rehearing were denied by an order of the Court of Appeals (App. 494) entered on October 4, 1971. Petitions for certiorari were filed on January 3, 1972, granted by this Court on February 28, 1972, and a contemporaneous order of consolidation thereby entered. The jurisdiction of this Court is based on 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS AND STATUTES INVOLVED

This case involves the First Amendment to the United States Constitution and Sections 3(h), 315(a) and 326 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, 47 U.S.C. Sections 153(h), 315(a) and 326.

The First Amendment to the Constitution provides:

> "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

Section 3(h) of the Communications Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 1065, et seq., as amended, 47 U.S.C. 153(h), provides:

> " 'Common carrier' or 'carrier' means any person engaged as a common carrier for hire, in interstate or foreign communication by wire or radio or in interstate or foreign radio transmission of energy, except where reference is made to common carriers not subject to this Act; but a person engaged in radio broadcasting shall not, insofar as such person is so engaged, be deemed a common carrier."

Section 315(a) of the Communications Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 1088, as amended, 47 U.S.C. 315(a), provides:

> "If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station: Provided, that such licensee shall have no power of censorship over the material broadcast under the provisions of this section. No obligation is imposed under this subsection upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate. Appearance by a legally qualified candidate on any—
> (1) bona fide newscast,
> (2) bona fide news interview,
> (3) bona fide news documentary (if the appearance of the candidate is incidental to the presentation of the subject or subjects covered by the news documentary), or
> (4) on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events (including but not limited to political conventions and activities incidental thereto), > shall not be deemed to be use of a broadcasting station within the meaning of this subsection. Nothing in the foregoing sentence shall be construed as relieving broadcasters, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events, from the obligation imposed upon them under this chapter to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance."

Section 326 of the Communications Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 1091, as amended, 47 U.S.C. 326, provides:

> "Nothing in this Act shall be understood or construed to give the Commission the power of censorship over the radio communications or signals transmitted by any radio station, and no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the Commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication."

QUESTION PRESENTED

Pursuant to the regulatory system established by the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, and administrative rules and policies formulated by the Federal Communications Commission, broadcast licensees are under a specific obligation to provide full and fair coverage of diverse viewpoints on controversial public issues. The question presented is whether, notwithstanding the foregoing obligation explicitly imposed by Congress and the Commission, the First Amendment additionally compels all broadcast stations to sell advertising time to individuals or groups for brief "spot" announcements asserting their particular views.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

In these consolidated cases, this Court is asked to review a decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit holding that the First Amendment dictates that broadcasters be required—pursuant to a set of regulations to be devised by the Federal Communications Commission[1]—to sell advertising time for the presentation of individualized views on public issues. This ruling flatly overturned two separate opinions of the Commission which had found that broadcast licensees, who are required by the Commission's "fairness doctrine" to originate programs involving controversial issues of public importance, are not also required to sell time to individuals and groups for the advertising of their particular views. Democratic National Committee, 25 F.C.C. 2d 216 (1970);[2] Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace, 25 F.C.C. 2d 242 (1970).[3]

Petitioner American Broadcasting Companies, Inc. (hereinafter "ABC") participated in the Democratic National Committee case before the Commission and intervened in support of the Commission and the United States of America when the matter reached the Court of Appeals.

ABC, itself or through its subsidiaries, is the licensee of a number of radio and television stations and operates radio and television networks. In this capacity, both through the ownership of individual stations and the operation of broadcast networks, providing program material to hundreds of affiliated stations, ABC is a source for the production and transmission of significant amounts of news and public affairs broadcasts on a wide and ever-changing variety of public issues.

A. Agency Proceedings

The Democratic National Committee case[4] originated with a request by the Democratic National Committee (hereinafter "DNC") that the Commission issue a declaratory ruling that, as a general matter, broadcast licensees are required to sell broadcast time to "responsible entities, such as DNC, for the solicitation of funds and for comment on public issues."[5] Framed in this fashion, the DNC petition contained no assertions that any particular broadcast licensee either had failed to provide fair and full coverage of important public issues, or had refused to sell time for comment on controversial public issues. Indeed, the request contemplated that notwithstanding such coverage or any individual offers of paid time for controversial issue comment, a general obligation remained as to all broadcasters to sell time to DNC and similar groups to present their viewpoint.[6]

Since the relief requested was partially premised on what DNC viewed as the restrictive nature of then existing policies of the three national television networks, the Commission solicited comments from the network companies.[7] ABC's response[8] set forth a number of internal policy standards which, inter alia, recognize an abiding responsibility to utilize the broadcast facilities under its direction in a manner which both safeguards and promotes the opportunity for the full exposure of representative views and controversial issues of general concern to the American people.[9] However, in a concomitant recognition of the public interest detriments and practical impediments associated with a universal and absolute right by any "responsible entity" to purchase time to espouse a point of view or solicit funds, ABC advised the Commission that it proposed to continue to adhere to its general approach of not selling time for controversial issue programs and announcements[10] and solicitation of funds, absent special public interest considerations. ABC did indicate, however, that although it was opposed to any ruling which would require the sale of time to all "responsible entities," it was prepared to accept—consistent with its policy of taking into account special public interest considerations—such orders for time from major political parties as could reasonably be accommodated.[11]

[4] As noted, ABC was a party below only to the Democratic National Committee (Case No. 24,537 in the court of appeals) proceeding. Accordingly, in this Statement we concentrate on the DNC case and, for the most part, rely on the briefs of the Government and Post-Newsweek, Capitol Area, Inc. for a description of the agency proceedings in the companion Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace case (Case No. 24, 492 below).

The ensuing Commission decision held that broadcasters must make time available "to significant political parties for the solicitaton of funds"[12] but that important statutory and policy considerations militated against granting DNC or any other particular individual or group an absolute right of access to broadcast time for the purpose of commenting on controversial issues of public importance.[13]

The Commission emphasized that although under prevailing policies a licensee was by no means precluded from selling time for controversial issue discussion, consistent with his fairness doctrine responsibilities, there were more compelling considerations that dictated the Commission's refusal to hold that a licensee is unyieldingly bound to sell time to particular persons or groups for the discussion of public issues over and above the exercise of his fairness doctrine responsibilities. A central element in weaving this conclusion was the Commission's recognition that the regulatory framework sanctioned by Congress in the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, deliberately avoided placing broadcasting in a "common carrier" mold. Thus, in contrast to common carriage, which is public in its availability but essentially private and passive in its communications function, broadcasting exists to simultaneously and indiscriminately communicate to the public at large.

As the Commission observed, this was the very role endorsed by this Court in Red Lion Broadcasting Company v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)—a role which contemplates that broadcast licensees will perform in a "fiduciary" capacity for the entire public they serve. In this context, the Commission noted that in Red Lion, this Court had characterized the broadcaster's task as being oriented to the presentation of "representative community views on controversial issues."[14] This undertaking does not, however, comprehend the further dimension embodied in the DNC petition, that there is an obligation to sell time for the presentation of individual views which transcends the fairness doctrine right of the public to be informed. As the Commission remarked, a determination of this sort would entail a substantial reordering of the fairness doctrine and a direct assault upon the touchstone of broadcast regulation—i.e., the concept set in motion by Congress, and more recently sustained by this Court in Red Lion, that the public interest obligation of broadcasters is to devote a reasonable amount of time to issues of public importance and to do so in a fair manner. To require broadcast licensees to sell time for these purposes would mean that "the public's agenda for discussion of public issues would then be set substantively and increasingly by the affluent"—i.e., by those persons and organizations who have ". . . the financial resources and interest to purchase sustained access to the mass communications media. . . ."[15]

[8] App. 42.

[9] Such views and issues are presented in a variety of program formats which not only affirmatively allow for the exposure of partisan spokesman and their views, but enable the presentation of such persons and groups on a free time basis—i.e., even in instances where the program may be wholly or partially sponsored, public issue spokesmen appearing thereon do not purchase this exposure.

[10] As the record reflects, ABC sells advertising time during both election and non-election periods to the major political parties for the solicitation of funds and for expression of views on public issues. In addition, during election campaigns, ABC sells advertising time to political parties, political candidates and their supporters, and to various spokesmen on public issues which are on the ballot.

[11] App. 46.

[12] The Commission found that the policies of three major networks (ABC, Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. and the National Broadcasting Company, Inc.) were consistent with that portion of its holding. (App. 269).

[13] In a separate action on the same day, the Commission decided the companion case herein, Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace ("BEM") (App. 357). There, the Commission rejected the complaint of an anti-war group against Washington, D.C. Radio Station WTOP which had refused to sell spot advertising time to present that group's views on the Vietnam war. As in the DNC case, the central contention in the BEM proceeding was that the First Amendment required WTOP to sell BEM time for the presentation of its individual views, even though the station had fully complied with its fairness doctrine obligations with respect to the exposition of significant contrasting views on the Vietnam War issue. In its decision, the Commission found that the fairness doctrine had not been violated and, relying on its contemporaneous DNC decision, that the First Amendment did not require WTOP to sell advertising time to BEM to present its views (App. 368).

[14] The Commission also pointedly emphasized that the obligation to present "representative views" was clearly intended to include views not held by the licensee and views expressed by non-station "partisan voices" (App. 259).

The Commission's decision, it must be emphasized, was not unmindful of the critical First Amendment interests at stake. However, unlike the court of appeals, the Commission reasoned that the public's First Amendment rights are better protected by the traditional regulatory scheme.[16] Accordingly, the Commission concluded that the present system of regarding licensees as "trustees" with an affirmative duty to present contrasting viewpoints through representative spokesmen, was of greater public benefit than—and could not reasonably co-exist with—a regulatory standard based on an individualized right of access.

Finally, the Commission addressed the position of dissenting Commissioner Johnson that the operation of a broadcast station is analogous to the administration of public facilities such as parks and municipal transit systems, and that once such a facility is utilized for some speech purposes the First Amendment requires that access be granted on the same basis to all potential customers.[17] In the Commission's view, the dissent failed to adequately assess the limited availability of radio time and the obligation imposed upon broadcasters, but not upon other media, to fully and fairly inform the public on all significant positions involving controversial issues. The Commission also found the approach posited by the dissent to ignore or to blithely treat substantial practical as well as conceptual problems.[18]

B. THE COURT OF APPEALS DECISION

Upon petitions for review of both the DNC and BEM decisions, a divided court of appeals reversed the separate decisions of the Commission—holding that, despite Congressional or agency policy to the contrary, the First Amendment requires broadcast licensees who sell time for spot advertisements for commercial products and services to make such advertising time[19] available to individuals and groups wishing to present their particular views on controversial issue subject matter.

The court determined that action by broadcast licensees constituted "state action" through the following syllogism. First, it found that broadcasting was undoubtedly a suitable medium for the communication of ideas. Secondly, since broadcast stations are "fiduciaries" of the public and operate only pursuant to a government license, the court found the broadcast business to have a public character. Finally, as to the specific cases on appeal, the court determined that there had been "approval of or acquiescense in" the challenged actions of the broadcasters by the Commission.[20]

Pursuant to the majority opinion, the newly articulated constitutional right to purchase spot announcements for public issue discussion would obtain regardless of whether the licensee in question was in full compliance with the Commission's fairness doctrine. Indeed, the right could be invoked even in circumstances where the issue and precise viewpoint the individual or organization seeks to address has been specifically covered in prior broadcasts.[21] The court brushed aside contentions of the Commission and broadcasters that the agenda for public issue discussion would increasingly be established at the whim of those persons and organizations having the ready resources to gain exposure of their individual viewpoints.

The Court of Appeals was unpersuaded that issue discussion in this segment of broadcast time would be unduly influenced by those persons and groups having the financial wherewithal to purchase media access and that, in the process (1) licensees would face diminished control over program content and schedules and (2) the prevailing fairness doctrine principle that contrasting views be presented free of charge if sponsorship is unavailable[22] could, when applied to this form of editorial announcement, impair the broadcast industry's financial base. The court simply remanded the cases to the Commission for the purpose of developing "reasonable regulatory guidelines" to somehow accommodate these and other factors.[23]

Although the court suggested that stations could establish a quantitative limit on such "editorial advertising" and could regulate the placement of such advertisements within reasonable limits, clearly the licensee could not "exercise the same 'authoritative selection' in editorial advertising which he exercises in normal programming."[24] Furthermore, that the licensee would not be allowed to exercise his traditional journalistic role is emphasized in the court's assertion that a request to purchase time cannot be rejected for the reason that the viewpoint a person or group may wish to present has been repeatedly broadcast in the past.[25] Similar restrictions appear to exist in terms of the ability to reject such advertising time on the basis that the content has either a marginal level of public interest or is in some respects offensive or inappropriate.[26]

In a dissenting opinion, Judge McGowan characterized the Commission's task on remand as one of "heroic proportions", the complexity of which might undermine the basic premise on which it was founded. In Judge McGowan's view, the newly established First Amendment right announced by the majority could interfere and frustrate the right—so essential to this Court's prior ruling in Red Lion—of the public to be fully informed. The private licensee system of broadcasting provided by Congress, operating under "the obligation . . . to advance the public's right to know by devoting a substantial amount of time to the presentation of controversial views on issues of public importance," has proven to be an effective mechanism for implementing the desired public policy.[27] To now disregard this regulatory scheme for a new "system in which money alone determines what issues are to be aired" would, Judge McGowan concluded, represent an unwise and unnecessary course.[28]

Petitions for rehearing to the court below were denied.[29] This Court granted the several petitions for certiorari on February 28, 1972 and entered a stay of the mandate of the Court of Appeals.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The decision of the court below is erroneously premised on a finding that the existing system of broadcast regulation, formulated and periodically recast by Congress and regularly administered by the Commission, is constitutionally deficient. Proceeding from this assumption, the lower court directed the Commission to establish guidelines to govern a new-found constitutional requirement that broadcast stations sell advertising time to individuals and groups for partisan "spot announcements" on public issues. While the lower court reiterated that it was asserting a limited right, the unequivocal constitutional basis therefor defies this characterization and clearly charts a course that goes beyond any demonstrated necessity to preserve First Amendment rights and undercuts a regulatory system fashioned by Congress which adequately serves First Amendment interests. Placing the individualized right to use broadcast facilities on a constitutional mantle in turn unnecessarily shackles the performance of the public trustee role created for licensees and renewed by this Court in its landmark decision in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

I.

It is now axiomatic that "unlike other media of expression, radio is inherently not available to all," National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 226 (1943), and consequently, a mechanism for selecting representative spokesmen is essential. It is for this reason that the Constitution permits a licensing scheme which provides "for the use of such [radio] channels, but not the ownership thereof, by persons for limited periods of time, under licenses granted by Federal authority." Section 301 of the Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C. § 301. This unique characteristic of the broadcast medium also underlies previous rejections by other courts of an individual right under the First Amendment to utilize broadcast facilities. McIntire v. William Penn Broadcasting Co., 151 F.2d 597 (3rd Cir. 1945), cert. denied, 327 U.S. 779 (1946); Massachusetts Universalist Convention v. Hildreth & Rogers Co., 183 F. 2d 497 (1st Cir. 1950).

The holding of the lower court dramatically departs from these decisions while misreading the application of the First Amendment to broadcasting in this Court's opinions in National Broadcasting Co. and Red Lion. The cases relied upon by the lower court to construe broadcast operations as "state action" and to thereby transform broadcast advertising time into a common carrier type public "forum" are inapposite and irrelevant to a medium where designated licensees are required to act as trustees for the public interest—particularly in their affirmative obligation to maintain a full and fair flow of information, including contrasting and partisan views on public issues. Therefore, it is inappropriate to analogize broadcasting with municipal transit systems and other non-communications entities which, if they sell advertising space to commercial advertisers, do so without primary obligations for the dissemination of public information.

First Amendment objectives in broadcasting cannot be served by compelling individual stations—under guidelines devised by the Commission—to implement the kind of system of paid partisan access articulated by the lower court. The central constitutional concern in the area of broadcasting is "the First Amendment goal of producing an informed public capable of conducting its own affairs." Red Lion, supra, 195, U.S. at 392. Because of limited spectrum space that can be used for broadcasting, implementation of the essential rights at stake is necessarily shaped by this practical barrier. Consequently, First Amendment objectives in broadcasting are to be achieved, not by means of an individualized right of access, but in the form recognized by this Court in Red Lion—i.e., a collective right of the public "to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral and other ideas and experiences." 395 U.S. at 390.

II.

A comprehensive regulatory scheme governing broadcasting was formulated by Congress based on the principle that the public's interest in receiving full and fair information on significant public issues could best be achieved through a formula of licensee trusteeship. Out of this formula have developed a number of operational criteria to insure that the statutory mandate of public service is carried out. Among these principles is the obligation, under the fairness doctrine, to devote a reasonable amount of broadcast time to the presentation of conflicting (including those of a partisan character) views on controversial issues. To date, this objective has been accomplished by the exercise of licensee discretion as to the selection of the spokesmen to appear and the subject material to be broadcast, subject to review by the Commission. Clearly, the licensee in this scheme is not a common carrier and the Communications Act specifically provides that he should not be a common carrier with respect to any of his operations.

Nothing before the lower court in these cases suggests that the First Amendment interests of the public in vigorous debate and effective self-expression are not being met through the operation of the present regulatory system. Indeed, the record reflects quite the contrary. Moreover, in the event there was evidence that any significant issues or viewpoints were being stifled, the Commission and Congress have sufficiently flexible authority to fashion those modifications which appear necessary to attain the essential objective of the fairness doctrine and the First Amendment interests that policy is intended to serve. In this respect, Congress has recently seen fit to amend the Communications Act to facilitate the use of broadcast facilities by political candidates and the Commission is presently conducting a comprehensive inquiry which seeks to resolve whether present policies sufficiently foster the First Amendment goal of "uninhibited, robust, wide-open debate" on whether revisions or even new policies are appropriate.

III.

The practical ramifications of the lower court decision are actually fundamentally inconsistent with the First Amendment goals which it purportedly attempts to enhance. In designating broadcast advertising time as a quasi-public forum for the discussion of public issues at the initiative of private interests, the court of appeals severely inhibits licensee discretion so central to the proper vindication of the public's interests under the fairness doctrine. The requirement of an individual right of access actually diminishes the licensee's capacity to carry out his public trustee responsibility. Some of the factors contributing to this diminished capacity include weighting the initiation of public issue discussion in favor of those most able to afford the purchase of spot announcements, the need to select public issue programming to counter-balance the concentrated expression of views by private factions rather than on the basis of journalistic discretion as to newsworthiness, and the increased involvement of the government in the control of broadcast speech. In place of a public trustee system whereby broadcast licensees are accountable to the Commission as to which issues, views and speakers should be presented, the court of appeals would sanction a system of at random selection by those able to pay, expressing views on issues of self-interest and presented absent any standards of professional journalism.

In the final irony, if the "regulatory guidelines" that the lower court envisions as resolving some of the practical problems associated with the new constitutional right are ultimately effective, they would actually thrust the federal government more directly into the decision-making process of determining and scheduling such broadcast content as news, cultural and public affairs programming. Clearly, the consequences of this course can hardly be said to enhance in any significant way the First Amendment interests that broadcasting is capable of fostering. Rather than the arms-length relationship between the government and broadcasters envisioned in the Communications Act as to the selection of program content, this decision foreshadows and even encourages the precise involvement that was intended to be avoided.

ARGUMENT

Introduction

These cases highlight the critical role the broadcast media play in keeping contemporary American society adequately informed on important public issues. That broadcasting in general and electronic journalism in particular have become major sources of information to the American public is, therefore, an undeniable threshold premise.

Into the bundle of intricate and interwoven rights and responsibilities that give broadcasting its unique regulatory and journalistic character, a negative and incompatible concept has been interjected. This concept is embodied in a newly asserted First Amendment "right" which would compel a broadcast station to sell "spot" advertising time for the expression of views on a controversial public issue without regard to previous and/or continuing coverage of the same issue based on news value criteria exercised in a traditional journalistic fashion.

Accordingly, this Court is asked to review the foregoing Constitutional contention, carried forward and reshaped by the court of appeals over the opposition of the agency charged with administering the Communications Act, because of its inevitable and profound consequences for all broadcast programming. In essence, to accept the new-found Constitutional right articulated by the lower court would be to reject important regulatory concepts derivative from the basic legislative framework and administrative policy based thereon.

In marked contrast to this Court's seminal decision in Red Lion, where the decisional context was whether certain regulatory measures were permissible under the First Amendment, here the lower court has held that, despite policy guidance by Congress or the Commission, the Constitution compels a divergent approach.

In this brief, ABC seeks to highlight the dubious new path that has been judicially drawn as well as to emphasize the very real practical impediments it engenders. Foremost in this evaluation, we believe, must be the recognition that the public interest is far better served by methods for the dissemination of ideas and experiences other than the personalized "right of access" recognized for the first time by the court of appeals.

The first amendment does not compel the designation of broadcast advertising time as a common carrier type forum in which broadcast stations are required to sell announcements to individuals or groups for the presentation of their particular views on public issues.

Congress has established, the courts have interpreted, and the Commission has long administered a statutory system for the broadcast media wherein licensees are obligated to provide full and fair coverage of controversial public issues. As Judge McGowan correctly observed in dissenting to the lower court decision:

> "This is the system which Congress has, wisely or not, provided as the alternative to public ownership and operation of radio and television communications facilities. This approach has never been thought to be other than within the permissible limits of constitutional choice. . . ." [30]

Notwithstanding the order of events acknowledged by Judge McGowan, and irrespective of the Commission's determination that this scheme satisfactorily insures that the American public is adequately informed on significant public issues,[31] the Court of Appeals has ruled that the First Amendment dictates that broadcast advertising time should be placed on a common carrier type basis to permit individuals and groups to utilize spot announcements to espouse views on the same issues broadcasters are otherwise required to cover.

In determining that the First Amendment establishes a right of access to a particular segment of broadcast time, the lower court's decision is squarely in conflict with prior decisions on the matter. While cognizant of the well-established principle that the First Amendment applies to governmental and not to private actions,[32] the court below found that the interrelationship between the FCC and its licensees is such that broadcast station operation effectively represents "state action" to which First Amendment protections extend.[33] That basic finding, however—essential to the court's ultimate holding—as well as the consequent entitlements it implies, was specifically eschewed in McIntire v. William Penn Broadcasting Co., 151 F.2d (3rd Cir. 1945), cert. denied, 327 U.S. 779 (1946).

In rejecting a religious organization's claim that it had a statutory and First Amendment right to purchase time on a station for the broadcast of its programs, the Third Circuit expressly pointed out that the broadcaster "is not an instrumentality of the federal government" for constitutional purposes. Id. at 601. Rather, the court recognized that under the regulatory scheme established by the Communications Act, a significant separation between the broadcaster and the state is evident in Congress' having "confided the selection of program material to be broadcast to the taste and discrimination of the broadcasting stations." Id. at 600. The court explained:

> "True, if a man is to speak or preach he must have some place from which to do it. This does not mean, however, that he may seize a particular radio station for his forum. . . . [A] radio broadcasting station is not a public utility in the sense that it must permit broadcasting by whoever comes to its microphones." [34]

Similarly, in Massachusetts Universalist Convention v. Hildreth & Rogers Co., 183 F.2d 497 (1st Cir. 1950), the First Circuit adopted the District Court's view that the conduct of broadcast licensees did not constitute "state action" as to which the First Amendment right of access asserted and upheld below would apply.

Significantly, the Court of Appeals specifically acknowledged the inconsistency of its decision with the First and Third Circuit decisions, but dismissed those decisions as representing a "crabbed judicial view of 'state action'." [35]

[35] App. 456. As noted, the McIntire court clearly rejected the view urged upon it that the respondent radio station was endowed "with the quality of an agency of the federal government", emphasizing that to so find "would be judicial legislation of the most obvious kind". McIntire, supra, 151 F.2d at 601. In rather dramatic contrast, the lower court in the instant cases not only found broadcast stations to be "agents of the government" but judicially inaugurated a sweeping reformation of the manner in which broadcasting is conducted—imposing completely new standards regarding the utilization of broadcast advertising time. See App. 448.

The lower court further found this Court's Red Lion decision—read to be "a clarion call for a new public concern and activism regarding the broadcast media"[36]—to clear the path of such "doctrinal impedimenta."

A. The Relevant First Amendment Objective Is to Guarantee That the Listening and Viewing Public is Not Left Uninformed—Not to Guarantee an Individual Right of Access.

This Court has, over the years, clearly emphasized that the essence of the First Amendment's protection of free speech and a free press is to protect the public generally, rather than particular private interests. See Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945); Red Lion, supra, 395 U.S. at 390. The objective in this process has been to assure that the general citizenry will have the necessary information to make the informed judgments on which a self-governing society is dependent.[37] In brief, the essential spirit of the free speech guarantee of the First Amendment is the right of the public to hear a diversity of viewpoints, thereby creating an informed public, and is not primarily founded upon protection of an individual right of self-expression. "[W]hat is essential is not that everyone shall speak, but that everything worth saying shall be said." Meiklejohn, POLITICAL FREEDOM: THE CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS OF THE PEOPLE 26 (1960).[38]

It is virtually undisputed that the First Amendment applies to radio and television. Whatever doubts might once have existed about the applicability of the First Amendment to mass communications media were dispelled in United States v. Paramount Pictures[39] where this Court stated that it had "no doubt" that radio, newspapers and moving pictures were covered by the First Amendment. However, the operating and technical nature of broadcasting—a simultaneous and indiscriminate communications technique utilizing a limited spectrum—dictates that the First Amendment objective of an informed public be implemented in a special way. As this Court emphasized in National Broadcasting Co. v. United States:[40]

> "Freedom of utterance is abridged to many who wish to use the limited familities of radio. Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all. That is its unique characteristic, and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to governmental regulation. Because it cannot be used by all, some who wish to use it must be denied."[41]

Such considerations were integral to this Court's analysis of the First Amendment's application to broadcasting in Red Lion. Acknowledging at the outset that the natural dearth of frequencies necessarily limits the individuals who can broadcast, the Court concluded that "it is idle to posit an unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish." 395 U.S. at 388. Accordingly, differences in the characteristics of particular media "justify differences in the First Amendments standards applied. . . ." Id. at 386. See Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 503 (1952). As to the broadcast media, it is the right of viewers and listeners which is "paramount" under the Constitution and may not be abridged. Red Lion, supra, 395 U.S. at 390. The peculiar characteristics of broadcasting underscore that this is to be achieved in the form of a collective right of the public "to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences." Ibid.

The court of appeals has drastically departed from the principles underlying application of the First Amendment to broadcasting developed in the National Broadcasting Co., and Red Lion cases. In insisting upon a personalized right of access, irrespective of the licensee's coverage of controversial issues, the lower court has raised an individual right of self-expression over the First Amendment interests of the public as a whole. It has, therefore, created an individual right of access in the face of past teachings that the broadcast medium is uniquely unsuited for such a concept. While a similar right of access may be adequate or constitutionally mandated for a public park or municipal transit system, it is neither adequate nor constitutionally mandated for a limited speech forum represented by the commercial radio spectrum.

B. A Finding That Broadcast Operations Are "State Action" Is Fundamentally Inconsistent With the First Amendment Requirements for Broadcasting.

In reaching its conclusion that the First Amendment mandated a right of access to broadcast advertising time, the Court of Appeals found "state action" in the activities of broadcast licensees. In this analysis the court relied at least partially on prior holdings that transportation systems[42] and school newspapers[43] operated by a public authority, could not, if they accepted advertising at all, refuse paid editorials. However, broadcasting is not a "public authority" in the context that its normal use originates with at random individual members of the public. While broadcasting is specifically intended to be responsive to the needs of the public as a whole, it is not designed to be "held out" to the public at large for indiscriminate use by individual members of that public. Further, unlike public transportation systems, there is no question of excluding certain views or a particular form of speech in broadcasting, because the statutory and regulatory scheme will not permit such exclusion. With public buses the only speech format is the advertising; with broadcasting the primary speech format is non-advertising time. As to the newspaper cases cited by the lower court,[44] it is sufficient to note that they involved media actually owned by government institutions, whereas broadcasting is cast in a private enterprise pattern and is specifically insulated with First Amendment interests of its own in its relationship with the government.[45]

The lower court found state action under an even broader rationale. In this scenario, broadcasting is licensed and regulated in the use of designated spectrum space, and the airwaves "are 'a limited and valuable part of the public domain,' leased out temporarily by the federal government which retains ultimate control over them."[46] In essence, the court suggests that "state action" for First Amendment purposes stems from the circumstance that broadcasting is a regulated entity. But nearly every dimension of contemporary society falls either temporarily or permanently within the purview of some administrative agency at some level of government. It is also equally fruitless to suggest that the degree of regulation is determinative in this equation since this could comprehend qualitative factors and broadcasting connotes an enterprise where specific provision has been made to minimize "state" involvement.

In laying the legislative foundation for broadcasting, Congress deliberately elected to place primary responsibility for operational decisions with private licensees rather than the federal governments. Inherent to that design, moreover, was the creation of a relationship which would minimize direct interference by the licensing authority. Accordingly, the state is specifically forbidden to directly exercise programming judgments (47 U.S.C. § 326) and the non-common carrier status of broadcasting (47 U.S.C. § 153(h)) precludes detailed supervision of many operational facets.[47]

The lower court also relied in this context on Public Utilities Commission v. Pollak, 343 U.S. 451 (1952) where this Court found that the activities of a bus company, which was privately owned but had operated under the regulatory jurisdiction of a government agency, amounted to "state action." Again, however, in this licensee situation the entity is one that normally holds itself out for the common carriage of the public, on demand, unlike broadcasting. Further, as noted, Congress has seen fit to fashion a specific regulatory regime in which, inter alia, a unique First Amendment relationship between government and private licensees has been forged.

[46] App. 460, quoting, in part, from Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ v. FCC, 359 F.2d 994, 1003 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

[47] For instance, under Title II of the Communications Act, which governs such common carrier activities as telephone and telegraph, the Commission is empowered to regulate rate and profits of carriers, as well as the conditions of service. No such authority exists over broadcasting which is regulated under Title III of the Act.

It is clear, therefore, that the statutory structure established by Congress for he regulation of broadcasting, as well as the medium's practical development n American society, defy a categorization of radio and television as public orums in the sense normally attributable to a finding of state action. The overiding factor of broadcast operations is that primary responsibility for broadcast naterial is lodged not with the federal government, but in private entities operatng as free from direct interference by the Commission as possible.

The most obvious thing about broadcasting is that it is unique as a communiations instrument and, as such, is neither analogous to public streets, parks nd facilities nor to regulated entities in the common carrier or public utility nold. Accordingly, such previous decisions of this Court as Amalgamated Food mployees Union, Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., 391 U.S. 308 (1968) and larsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946), form an inadequate basis for so drasically transforming the function and role of the broadcast media. While those ases extended the "state action" concept to protect First Amendment rights rom infringement by persons and entities claiming a private function, the acivities and "forums" involved totally inapposite circumstances—a company own (Marsh) and a suburban shopping center parking lot (Logan Valley)—here, unlike broadcasting, the facilities had been dedicated to a previous at andom public use. For instance, the owners in these circumstances had allowed eneral public access to the facilities, but denied access for peaceful picketing r leafleting. To argue that there is no "state action" in a traditional sense is ot to say that broadcasting is not affected with a strong public interest charcter; rather, the point worthy of emphasis is that broadcasting simply cannot e equated with other speech forums in terms of its openness and ready availbility to the public. For example, a state controlled newspaper is both state irected and unlimited in its capacity to add lines of type and pages of print. imilarly, a public park is, in the normal course, entered at the discretion of the ublic, not a private gatekeeper.

It has long been acknowledged that application of the First Amendment urns on the purpose and function of the medium of communication involved. oseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 502-03 (1952). "The right to reedom of speech does not open every avenue to one who desires to use a paricular outlet for expression. On the contrary, each particular avenue for expression presents its own peculiar problems." [48] In point of fact, the ease and manner of access to a particular forum must vary with the nature and limitaion of that forum—conditions which must take into account the interests the forum is designed to serve beyond catering to individual requests. Accordingly, what is appropriate for a municipal park or bus terminal is not necessarily appropriate for a medium such as broadcasting that has journalistic responsibilities.

In the "state action" cases relied upon by the lower court, the person or entity required to permit access was engaged in no independent journalistic role, but served merely as a passive instrumentality for the speech activities of others. In other words, the function at issue was more traditionally one of common carriage where facilities are generally and principally publicly utilized. In broadcasting, licensees are charged with the duty to present the speech of others as well as their own with the ultimate responsibility for broadcast content resting with the stations.

In sum, by attaching a state action status to broadcast activities and creating a right of access to at least a portion of radio and television time, the Court of Appeals has misconstrued the previous decisions of this Court treating the relationship of broadcasting and the First Amendment. See, e.g., National Broadcasting Co., supra, 319 U.S. at 226. Indeed, in its more recent Red Lion opinion, this Court emphasized that "it is idle to posit an unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish." [49]

[49] Red Lion, supra, 395 U.S. at 388. Perhaps the ultimate irony of the lower court opinion in this regard is that, upon a finding of "state action" in broadcast operations, and the establishment of a broad constitutional right of paid partisan access to the medium, the court concludes that this "right" is "abridgeable" and might not be given any effect if a broadcast station carried no commercial advertising. (App. 475). Therefore, although noncommercial educational stations are fully comprehended by the statutory scheme and Commission regulations designed to enhance the public's right to full and fair information, they would presumably be exempt from the system initiated by the lower court.

The plain meaning of Red Lion, we suggest, is that private interests must necessarily be subordinated to the paramount public interest in prudent utilization of the limited technical resource. Integral to such use is the presentation of "representative community views" on public issues. Id. at 394. (emphasis added). The critical right protected by the First Amendment as it applies to broadcasting is the right of the viewing and listening public to be informed (id. at 390):

> "It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here. That right may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the FCC."

The individual access result reached by the court of appeals is not only different from the collective public access right approved by this Court in Red Lion, it represents a disservice to the very First Amendment interests on which the opinion below relies. Furthermore—as we now demonstrate—irrespective of the lower court's erroneous conclusion that broadcast operations are "state action", a comprehensive and flexible regulatory scheme exists to ensure that broadcast stations do not discriminate against speech on public issues and that the First Amendment interests of the public are fully vindicated.

II.

An Individualized "Right" to Purchase Spot Advertising Time on Broadcast Stations to Discuss Controversial Issues Which Have Been Covered in Other Broadcast Programming is Fundamentally Inconsistent With the System of Regulation Selected by Congress

In holding that private individuals and groups have a First Amendment entitlement to purchase spot announcements on broadcast stations, the Court of Appeals opinion represents, as we have shown, not only a misconception of this Court's prior decisions dealing with the relationship of broadcasting and the First Amendment, but also a fundamental inconsistency with the Congressional design of the broadcaster-federal government relationship fashioned in the Communications Act of 1934.

A. A Comprehensive Legislative and Administrative Framework Insures that Broadcast Licensees Serve the Public Interest Through the Presentation of Full and Fair Information on Significant Public Issues.

Since broadcasting, unlike other modes of expression, is inherently unavailable to all, it has been necessary to erect a mechanism to govern the inevitable selection process.[50] It was in recognition of this characteristic that the Commission in its early formulation of the fairness doctrine noted as follows:

> "In determining whether to honor specific requests for time, the station will inevitably be confronted with such questions as whether the subject is worth considering, whether the viewpoint of the requesting party has already received a sufficient amount of broadcast time, or whether there may not be other available groups of individuals who might be more appropriate spokesmen for the particular point of view than the person making the request." [51]

In essence, prior to the lower court decision, the abiding concept was that it is the "right of the public to be informed, rather than any right on the part of the government, any broadcast licensee or any individual member of the public to broadcast his particular views on any matter, which is the foundation stone of the American system of broadcasting." Editorializing Report, 13 F.C.C. at 1249; see also Red Lion, supra, 395 U.S. at 390 (1969). Indeed, the District of Columbia Circuit has recently reaffirmed an earlier statement made by a different panel of that court, in a case decided prior to the instant cases, that no individual or group has a right of access. Thus, in dealing with the Democratic National Committee contention that the DNC had an organizational right to broadcast time to respond to Presidential appearances, the court concluded as follows:

> "We believe DNC's position to be fallacious and point to our recent decision in Green v. FCC [447 F.2d 323, 328 (D.C. Cir. 1971)], where we state that no individual or group 'has the right of access to the air; the licensee may exercise their judgment as to what material is presented and by whom'."[52]

The lower court, we submit, too conveniently ignores the conceptual underpinning of the broadcast media and the practical conditions which have grown up around broadcasting. Rather than attaching a common carrier status to broadcasting, Congress specifically chose to establish a system under which limited-term licenses are granted for use of broadcasting frequencies,[53] and licensees are committed to operate their facilities in the "public interest."[54] This system entails a procedure of periodic review to ensure that the overall operation of given broadcast facilities is consistent with the needs and interests of the respective communities involved.

Under the broad public interest standard, a number of operational criteria have developed. Thus, out of the statutory mandate of public service have evolved such basic principles as (1) the licensee obligation to periodically survey communities served in order to ascertain problems and interests[55] and (2) the obligation, under the fairness doctrine, to devote a reasonable amount of broadcast time to the presentation of conflicting (including those of a partisan character) views on controversial issues. A further distinguishing characteristic of the broadcast medium, therefore, is that different licensees meet their responsibilities in different ways. This is not only reflective of the statutory scheme and the Commission policies which promote flexibility in serving public needs and disseminating news and information, it is a logcal and necessary consequence of the variety of broadcast facilities.[56]

Any suggestion that significant viewpoints are excluded from the broadcast airwaves is simply unfounded on the record in these cases. Indeed, the complainant groups below (DNC and BEM) acknowledge either implicitly or explicitly that they seek a special kind of access to the broadcast media that ignores consideration of whether a particular viewpoint has previously been presented on broadcast stations[57] and, in this context, whether the public has been adequately informed as to that viewpoint. The fact is that neither the Commission nor the court below has made a finding that the fairness doctrine and other administrative policies flowing from the legislative framework established by Congress are insufficient to satisfy the First Amendment interest of an informed public. Indeed, the Commisison was of the very opposite persuasion, that the present regulatory system affirmatively serves the paramount right of the public to receive access to information on significant issues and experiences, and that engrafting an individual right to purchase advertising for these purposes would actually inhibit and frustrate the overall public objective.[58]

Accordingly, the record in these cases will not support a contention that the public faces any informational gap or, indeed, that most licensees do not now afford sufficient access for ideas and opinions expressed by partisan voices. Nevertheless, the court of appeals has determined that there should be a right of access to a limited kind of broadcast time without consideration of the degree of access that is available in different forms on the multitude of broadcast stations throughout the country. In contrast, of course, the administrative agency given the responsibility for measuring public needs in this regard has concluded that although (1) there is no present deficiency in the information the public receives[59] (2) a general reexamination of contemporary requirements and procedures is nevertheless warranted.[60] Additionally, it is important to emphasize that no Commission policy precludes any station from selling any type of broadcast time to persons and groups for the discussion of controversial issues.[61]

In addition, there were 518 educational FM stations and 214 educational television stations.

[57] For example, in the BEM case the record shows that WTOP had presented a wide variety of representative views on the Vietnam War, including the specific viewpoint BEM sought to broadcast. In the DNC case, the complainant had not even specified the issues or particular viewpoints it wished to express.

[58] See, e.g., App. 269.

By singling out a certain block of broadcast time and enveloping the right to purchase such time in a constitutional mode, the Court of Appeals introduces a new conceptual standard that will adversely affect all broadcast programming. Under the existing broadcast system, it is not necessary to set aside a definable time period for the expression of viewpoints; a typical broadcast station already accomplishes this, and more effectively, in a number of different ways. These include, inter alia, replies to editorials, the appearance of private and public officials in discussion and documentary programming, telephone call-in programs, guest appearances on entertainment/talk shows, the reading of viewer's written opinions and editorial "feed-back" programs, the open-mike procedure allowing listeners to telephone in comments which can be taped and then re-broadcast, the carriage of editorials suggested by members of the public and interviews within news programs.[62]

The record in these cases clearly offers no support for a conclusion that the present system of broadcast regulation does not adequately serve the paramount First Amendment right of the public to be informed. Furthermore, the regulatory regime set out by Congress not only does not require broadcast licensees to sell advertising time to individuals or groups to present their particular views on public issues,[63] it deliberately rejects a system of individual access.

1. The Public Trustee Concept Underlying the Statutory Standard Deliberately and Inherently Rejects A Common Carrier Role For Broadcasting.—In setting the legislative foundation culminating in the Communications Act of 1934, Congress affirmatively rejected the proposition that the broadcast media should be subjected to an individual right of access. One of the clearest manifestations of this fundamendal decision is found in Section 3(h) of the Act which expressly provides that "a person engaged in radio broadcasting shall not, insofar as such person is so engaged, be deemed a common carrier." 47 U.S.C. § 153(h).[64] Any standard along the lines suggested by the Court of Appeals that broadcast licensees must make one segment of their broadcast time an open forum (however modified) for the sale of time to persons and groups for the presentation of their views on public issues, would, in effect, make broadcasters "common carriers" in contravention of the express language of Section 3(h) of the Communications Act—

[60] Accordingly, the Commission has recently launched an administrative proceeding which, in the context of the fairness doctrine, represents a comprehensive exploration of the process by which public issue information is disseminated via the broadcast media. The specific objective of this proceeding is to ascertain what problems, if any, exist and, where appropriate, to devise suitable solutions therefor. See In re Notice of Inquiry in Docket No. 19260, 30 F.C.C. 2d 26 (1971).

[63] A fact conceded by the court below (App. 455).

[64] Not only the plain language of the statute, but the legislative history indicates that the decision by Congress to reject a common carrier status for broadcasting ,and consequently to make licensees responsible for program selection and content, was a deliberate decision. For instance, during the early debate on the Radio Act of 1927 (44 Stat. 1162), Congress considered and subsequently rejected the notion that broadcasters should be charged with a common carrier responsibility. In deliberations leading to enactment of the 1927 Act, the original bill as reported by the Senate Committee contained a common carrier provision to the effect that "if any licensee shall permit a broadcasting station to be used . . . for the discussion of any question affecting the public, he shall make no discrimination as to the use of such broadcasting station, and with respect to said matters, the licensee shall be deemed a common carrier in interstate commerce." 67 Cong. Rec. 12503 (1926); S. Rep. No. 772, 69th Cong., 1st Sess. 4 (1926). However, this language was deleted from the committee bill by the full Senate. See 67th Cong. Rec. 12501–02 (1926). A subsequent revision of this portion of the bill resulted in Section 315 affording reply opportunities only in the limited situation involving political candidates. In the Conference Report that followed, Congress reaffirmed the conclusions reached in the Senate debate that it would be unwise to cloak broadcasting with a common carrier status. See 68 Cong. Rec. 2[illegible] (1927). Several years later during deliberations on the successor Communications Act of 1934, efforts were renewed to legislate some form of broadcast media access. For instance, Congressman McFadden proposed that broadcasting stations be forbidden to discriminate against programs sponsored by any religious, charitable or educational association. H.R. 7986, 73rd Cong., 2d Sess. (1934). The Federal Radio Commission opposed the McFadden Bill and it was not reported out of committee. Hearings on H.R. 8301 Before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 73rd Cong., 2d Sess. 349–52 (1934). Accordingly, as finally adopted, the Communications Act of 1934 specifically declared that broadcasters are not to be deemed common carriers.

and in basic disharmony with the public trusteeship formula otherwise characteristic of the broadcast section of the legislation.[65]

The plain meaning of the statutory language and the legislative history which rejects placing broadcasting on a common carrier basis, has been, up to now, consistently affirmed by judicial interpretation. In McIntire v. William Penn Broadcasting Company, 151 F.2d 597 (3rd Cir. 1945), cert. denied, 327 U.S. 779 (1946), the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit held that it would be inconsistent with the Communications Act to hold that a religious organization had a right to purchase time on a station for the broadcast of its programs. The court stated that "it is clear from hisory and the interpretation of he Federal Communications Act that the choice of programs rests with the broadcasting stations licensed by the FCC", and that "Congress has confided the selection of program material to be broadcast to the taste and discrimination of the broadcasting stations." Id. 599–600. Consequently, "a radio broadcasting station is not a public utility in the sense that it must permit broadcasting by whoever comes to its microphones." Id. at 601. See also FCC v. Sanders Bros. Radio Station, 309 U.S. 470, 474 (1940).

We believe that the essence of the McIntire and similar decisions was recognized by this Court in Red Lion. The thrust of that decision is not that the broadcast licensee is a common carrier, required to sell time to all applicants on public issues, but rather that he is a public trustee—a proxy—who must present representative community views and voices on controversial issues. The decision thus stresses the right of the public to be informed—not the right of the broadcaster or any individual or group to speak over given broadcast facilities.

In summary, the regulatory system established by Congress proceeds from two interrelated principles. One, rather than sharing the common carrier monopoly role ascribed to telephone and telegraph, broadcasting was to be characterized by private ownership operating on frequencies assigned under a public interest standard by an expert regulatory agency. Secondly, the designated licensees of such frequencies, in marked contrast to the passive role of common carriers under the Communications Act, were to bear an affirmative responsibility for the content of material broadcast, acting in a trustee capacity for the public at large. This initial legislative distinction shapes and permeates our entire system of broadcast regulation.

2. Developments In Administrative Interpretation and Statutory Amendment Demonstrate the Viability of the Public Trustee System.—Commission administration of the legislative scheme, and amendments thereto by Congress over the years, cumulatively reflect the vitality and practical wisdom of the threshold decision that broadcasters are to be trustees for the public, not common carriers. Moreover, pertinent development aptly demonstrate that the system designated by Congress is capable of making adjusments which, in a contemporary setting, appear necessary to continue to serve as well as preserve the public's paramount right to be informed.

Issued fifteen years after passage of the basic statute, the Commissioner's Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees[66] represents the agency's most comprehensive articulation of the fairness doctrine[67] which—while not in the 1934 Act—was adopted in recognition of the public's right to receive full and fair information on all significant issues. This Report was issued in connection with public hearings designed to clarify the obligations of broadcast licensees and to explore various problem areas.[68] The Report emphasized that the licensee was to perform as a public trustee, and, in this capacity, could determine what should be broadcast and by whom, making such decisions in a manner that would promote the public's First Amendment interests in free and open debate. In the Commission's words:[69]

> "Only where the licensee's discretion in the choice of the particular programs to be broadcast over his facilities is exercised so as to afford a reasonable > opportunity for the presentation of all responsible positions on matters of sufficient importance to be afforded radio time can radio be maintained as a medium of freedom of speech for the people as a whole. These concepts, of course, do restrict the licensee's freedom to utilize his station in whatever manner he chooses but they do so in order to make possible the maintenance of radio as a medium of freedom of speech for the general public."

[66] 13 F.C.C. 1246 (1949).

[68] Report on Editorializing, supra, 13 F.C.C. at 1246. See also note 60, supra, describing more recent activities of the Commission in this regard. In the pending proceeding initiated in 1971, the Commission has framed the basic objective of its current review as being directed to an examination of whether Commission policies promote to the maximum extent possible the national goal of fostering "uninhibited, robust, wide-open" debate on public issues. In re Fairness Doctrine Study, supra, 30 F.C.C. 2d at 27.

Therefore, the essential ingredient of the fairness doctrine as originally formulated was the principle that the public interest is best served by requiring the presentation of opposing viewpoints on controversial issues under the supervision and control of licensees. In 1969 when this Court addressed the fairness doctrine and its extension in the political editorializing and personal attack rules,[70] the main thrust in sustaining these Commission policies was the paramount First Amendment interest that resided with the public at large. Red Lion supra, 395 U.S. at 390.

At about the same time the Commission was developing and refining the fairness doctrine, repeated attempts were being made in Congress to expand the coverage of Section 315 of the Communications Act which had been originally fashioned only to extend "equal opportunities" to opposing political candidates in the use of broadcast facilities.[71] In brief, despite such attempts to expand the coverage of Section 315 to spokesmen for candidates and ohter election issues[72]—Congress has carefully circumscribed the purview of Section 315.

In the first significant modification of that provision—the 1959 amendments—Congress actually refined the scope of Section 315 by exempting from the equal opportunities requirement appearances by candidates on newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events. 73 Stat. 557 (1959). Thus, Congress intended to restrict the right of individual access for candidates to broadcast facilities and thereby preserve to the greatest extent possible journalistic discretion in broadcasting.[73]

Of perhaps even greater significance, the 1959 amendments also saw Congress ratify and adopt the Commission's fairness doctrine as part of the public interest standard[74] by the addition of this sentence to Section 315(a):[75]

> "Nothing in the foregoing sentence [containing the news exemptions] shall be construed as relieving broadcasters, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events, from the obligation imposed upon them under this chapter to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance."

Since the concept of licensee discretion and responsibility, as distinguished from an individualized right of access, is central to the fairness doctrine, the absorption of this Commission policy in the 1959 statutory amendments makes the concept an integral part of the basic legislative fabric.

The dynamics of the legislative process as it bears on our communications system is also reflected in the 1972 amendments to the Communications Act. These amendments not only vastly alter the requirements pertaining to the use of the "communications media" for political purposes,[76] they are indicative of the role gress is able to exert in overseeing the basic statutory system. Just as Con- ss initially rejected a common carrier role for broadcasting—electing instead place programming responsibility with licensees—in a more contemporary en- onment it has responded to what it perceived as a special need in the politi- area.

[70] These rules represent an instance in which the Commission deemed it necessary to formulate detailed and definitive guidelines to govern licensee conduct in certain limited circumstances. (See note 90, infra). Otherwise, the fairness doctrine has been refined over the years on a cases-by-case basis. See Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine to Broadcast Licensees, 29 Fed. Reg. 10415 (1964). The Commission has, moreover, modified the fairness doctrine as it applies to political broadcasts to the extent of adopting a "quasi equal opportunities" approach in defined instances. For example, it has recently ruled that when a station sells time to spokesmen for or supporters of a political candidate during an election campaign, it must likewise make time available on the same basis to spokesmen for or supporters of opposing candidates. Letter to Nicholas Zapple, 23 F.C.C. 2d 707 (1970).

[76] Among the major changes effectuated by the 1972 amendments are the establishment of spending limits by some political candidates in the communications media, greatly modified campaign contributions reporting requirements, and the fixing of maximum rates various media may charge for the use of their facilities by political candidates. See Conf. Rep. No 92–580, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971).

ccordingly, the newly enacted Campaign Communications Reform Act[77] ends the Federal Communications Act to require broadcast licensees to allow sonable access to their facilities by candidates for federal elective office. Sec- n 103(a)(2)(A) of this Reform Act amends Section 312(a) of the Communica- ns Act to read as follows:[78]

> "The Commission may revoke any station license or construction permit—
> (7) for willful or repeated failure to allow reasonable access to or permit purchase of reasonable amounts of time for the use of a broadcasting station by a legally qualified candidate for Federal elective office on behalf of his candidacy."

ection 103(a)(2)(B) of the new statute amends Section 315(a) of the Com- nications Act[79] by adding the three italicized words to the following language:

> "No obligation is imposed under this sub-section upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any [political] candidate." (Emphasis added.)

These amendments are, therefore, consistent with previous Commission and ngressional determinations that the public interest requirements for the presen- tion of issues of public importance within the inherent limitations of the broad- st spectrum are a practical task peculiarly suited to resolution by Congress or the Commission. They are also reflective of the awareness and ability of Con- ess to modify the basic legislation so as to grant or preclude such individualized edia access as is deemed necessary[80] and consistent with the overall regulatory heme—a pattern which vests with licensees the responsibility to choose, subject their obligations under the fairness doctrine, what issues should be covered, at manner of presentation is most appropriate and what spokesmen are best ited to present the various sides of such issues.

III.

e Decision of the Court of Appeals Will Substantially Impede the Perform- ance of a Licensee's Public Trustee Role, Diminish the Exercise of a Broad- aster's Journalistic Discretion, and Increase Governmental Control of Broad- cast Speech

Reversal of the lower court's decision is particularly warranted in light of the bstantial adverse impact its implementation will have on the broadcast indus- y generally, and on the future administration of the Communications Act. As ted, the American system of broadcasting has been founded on a recognition at by its inherent nature the medium cannot be available to all,[81] and a de- rmination that broadcasters, rather than government, should perform the func- on of determining who can be accommodated.

In performing that dimension of his "public trustee" role involving the selec- on of material to be broadcast, the licensee is guided by a standard which antici- tes a "diligent, positive and continuing effort . . . to discover and fulfill the stes, needs and desires of his community or service area."[82] Generally, this tails a discretionary allocation between entertainment and non-entertainment gramming, and determinations as to the scheduling and time devoted to such gram categories as education, religion, sports, minority interest, news and blic affairs.

This measure was designed to develop a Congressional right of access counter-balance the use of television by the Executive branch of the government. It ould have amended Section 315 of the Communications Act to provide that licensees set ide "a reasonable amount of public service time to authorized representatives [of Con- ess] to present the views of the Senate and the House of Representatives on issues of ublic importance."

[82] En Banc Program Policy Statement, 20 Pike and Fischer, Radio Regulation 1901, 1913, 5 Fed. Reg. 7291, 7295 (1960).

This fundamental regulatory principle has also been the essential predi for the Commission's fairness doctrine which, while requiring treatment of posing views on controversial issues, permits licensee discretion in the selec of spokesmen, schedules and program format. Under the terms of the low court's decision, however, that discretion is significantly diminished; broad casters would apparently no longer be able to decide to exclusively meet the "fairness" obligations by public affairs and news programing, even though th may seem to be the approach best designed to inform the public.[83]

The likely practical effects of the Court of Appeals opinion include weight the initiation of public issue discussion in favor of those most able to aff the purchase of "editorial advertising," the resultant heavier involvement the Commission in disputes over who is to have access, and the transforma of public affairs programing from an innovative self-initiating posture to so thing more and more restricted as it is increasingly employed as a respons device for spot announcements.

Although the lower court attempted to discount the serious consequences its ultimate holding with a corrollary declaration that there is no absolute ri in any person or group to air any particular "editorial advertisement"[84] an that licensees need only accept some such announcements under guidelines to devised by the Commission,[85] the practical detriments to the overall public int est are not so easily avoided. Clearly, if a right of broadcast access is to be dividualized on a constitutional mantle, the process of promulgating and forcing "reasonable" rules cannot avoid impairment of a licensee's capacity fulfill his overall obligations to the public.

Two principal characteristics typify network and station advertising time— it is limited (especially in "prime time" when heavy demand accentuates inherent time restrictions) and it is expensive. Under the system establish by the court of appeals, a premium is automatically placed on wealth in at leas initially using broadcast facilities to disseminate controversial issue advertis ments. Consequently, undue encouragement is given to the exposure in t format of either (1) the side of a controversial issue espoused by those greatest wealth or (2) the limited issues which only attract well financed peting groups. This not only produces an unwarranted discrimination agai particular viewpoints and particular issues, but represents a direct impedim to the paramount right of the public to be informed by receiving access broad range of social, political and other ideas and experiences. Red Li supra, 395 U.S. at 390.

A less tangible but equally pertinent impact of the system imposed by Court of Appeals decision is that broadcaster independence in the news and pu affairs area is necessarily diminished to the extent there may be a need to p such programming in a contrasting posture to the paid controversial issue nouncements of others broadcast throughout the day, week or month. In normal course, news and public affairs programming is designed to be res sive to the fluctuating needs and interests of the public as a whole. To a sig cant extent, therefore, public events and problems determine program relev However, the changes set in motion by the Court of Appeals are potentially ruptive of this traditional journalistic process. For in many cases broadca will be forced to consider factors other than news value as a motivatio public affairs programming—placing increasing emphasis in content sele on matters which, irrespective of primary news value, may be the subje extended treatment in spot announcements prepared by controversial advertisers.

Thus, unless one assumes that issues initiated by advertisers—issues wh because of a lack of newsworthiness, a broadcaster may not have intend cover—can be adequately covered exclusively by paid spot announcemen broadcaster would be expected to devote a certain amount of his regular gram" time (news, public affairs, etc.) to the presentation of contrasting order to discharge his public trustee role of keeping the public adequately formed on the issues. In brief, the broadcaster will not only be forced to re- nquish a degree of control in initially selecting his news and public affairs ogramming, he may have to substitute programming representing a view con- ary to that expressed in a concentrated series of spot announcements for pro- amming previously planned on a subject matter of greater relevance to his dience. This anomaly was recognized by dissenting Judge McGowan who cor- ctly characterized the distorted design nominated by the majority below as one herein:

[83] The lower court actually acknowledges the essentially distorted and artificial sion of viewpoints possible from their presentation in a fleeting 20 or 30 second "We recognize, of course, that the onesidedness and private editing of particular editorial advertisements may in the end steer viewers and listeners away from the by distorting complex issues." (App. 472). Objective information value would be further diminished by the non-applicability of such policies as the fairness doct private "editorial advertisers" and the absence of professional journalism standards

> ". . . money alone determines what issues are to be aired, and in what format, even assuming as is likely to be the case, that those issues, whatever they may prove to be, compare favorably with the intellectual content of the great bulk of commercial advertising. The responsibility for informing the public is now squarely on the licensee. That responsibility will only be diluted and obscured by requiring the licensee, against his own better judgment, to accept paid editorial advertising."[86]

Thus, mandating the sale of spot announcements for the individual expression f views on public issues, without the exercise of journalistic judgments by censees as to the newsworthiness of the matters to be discussed, or consideration s to the adequacy of previous coverage and the appropriateness of particular pokesmen, will inevitably result in unfair and artificial exposure of some issues nd some viewpoints.

An even greater threat to broadcasters' journalistic independence is the re- ultant intrusion of the FCC into day-to-day station and network operations. here can be no doubt that, from the initial setting of "reasonable regulatory uidelines" to implement the lower court's directive,[87] the Commission would in- reasingly be called upon to rule on such matters as (1) what issues are to be overed; (2) what viewpoints on given issues require more or less attention; (3) hat persons or groups are to be allowed to express their views; (4) what view- oints particular groups or spokesmen actually represent; and (5) what, if any, ime limit should apply. Disputes over the exercise of the newly articulated right ill be inevitable and prolific, thrusting the Commission—and likely the courts s well—further and more profoundly into the area of program judgments of ews and editorial material.[88]

Significantly, any refusal by a licensee to broadcast a given editorial announcement will generate the contention that such refusal constitutes an infringement f the applicant's right of free speech. Thus, irrespective of the manner and form f any resulting Commission "guidelines", the First Amendment ground on which he Court of Appeals decision is based presumably dictates that a reason be given or any licensee refusal. Thereupon, the Commission will be placed in the position f arbitrating the basis for any such refusal by measuring the licensee's reason or declining to broadcast certain announcements against the applicable guide- ine. As a consequence, the lower court decision will result in increased and undesirable government supervision of licensee day-to-day programming judgments.[89]

[86] App. 490–91. At present, because the licensee is cognizant that he may have to present opposing viewpoints free of charge, Cullman Broadcasting Co., 40 F.C.C. 576 (1963), he is able to take this into account in planning coverage. However, under the right articulated by the court of appeals, the Cullman principle is invoked at the initiative of the spot advertiser. In this scheme, it is possible for the advertiser's financial resources to determine "what issues are to be aired", with the broadcaster required to make free time available to permit a fair presentation of the issues. See concurring statement of Commissioner Cox in BEM, App. 368. Finally, any suggestion that the Cullman principle or the fairness doctrine be suspended in these circumstances (see Commissioner Johnson dissent, App. 281) could result in the public being left uninformed.

[88] This would be directly counter to the Commission's long maintained policy of specifically avoiding any intrusion "in the news or editorial decision processes of licensees, because such intrusion by the government licensing agency might have a chilling effect on journalistic enterprise." In re Fairness Complaint of Sidney Willens and Russell Millin, 33 F.C.C. 2d 304, 309 (1972). See also In re Mrs. J. R. Paul, 26 F.C.C. 2d 591 (1969); Letter to ABC, CBS and NBC, 16 F.C.C. 2d 650 (1969); New York City Health and Hospitals Corp., 32 F.C.C. 2d 299 (1971); In re "The Selling of the Pentagon", 30 F.C.C. 2d 150, 152–53 (1971).

[89] Were the Commission to assume the responsibility to designate the issues or the spokesmen to be presented during broadcast advertising time, it would run a grave danger of violating the strictures of Section 326 of the Communications Act, 47 U.S.C. § 326. Like the refusal of Congress to require broadcasters to afford an individual right of access (see pp. 36–43, supra.), Section 326 reflects a firm Congressional intention to place the choice of programming in the hands of broadcast licensees. That section not only forbids any censor-

In sum, such an intrusion on the broadcaster's ultimate responsibility select and transmit program material[90] operates in a dual inhibitory fashion it directly affects program judgments as to the material proffered by an "editorial advertiser" in a spot announcement context and indirectly influences programming decisions in other areas. A significant modification in one area of programming could well induce changes in other areas. For instance, assuming that the constitutional basis for the lower court decision would not permit any rejection of proffered announcements on grounds of previous or intended coverage of the issues[91] a heavy concentration of announcements on an issue such as the nation's economic health could cause a broadcaster seeking to maintain a semblance of balanced treatment to forego certain program selections in order to prepare and present material directly responsive to the repeated position expressed in the saturated announcement schedule.

A basic error of the Court of Appeals opinion—an error which bears directly upon the reasonableness of licensee discretion in determining whether to accept or to reject controversial issue announcements—is the assumption that time devoted to commercial announcements is merely a segment of the broadcast "relinquished by broadcasters to others" and that it is not "closely controlled and edited by broadcasters", so that "all that is at issue is their decision as to which other parties will be given an opportunity to speak."[92] Elsewhere the court asserts that this is "an area in which editorial control over content has never been of major importance."[93]

This assumption is clearly erroneous. In screening commercial announcements for which broadcast time is sought, licensees exercise control over not only the "time, place and manner of speech" and other housekeeping functions referred to in the court's opinion,[94] but also substantive content. Thus, broadcast licensees, as part of their "public interest" performance, review proferred material to screen out false, misleading and deceptive advertisements, libelous statements, promotions of lotteries and other illegal activities, obscene, profane and indecent expressions, and other forms of speech found objectionable or questionable under federal statute, state law, FCC and Federal Trade Commission policy, and industry and licensee standards of good practice and taste.[95] Licensees must also concern themselves with the "reliability and reputation of every prospective advertiser and . . . his ability to fulfill promises made to the public over the licensed facilities."[96] ship of broadcast programming, but provides that the Commission should not set any regulations which would interfere with free speech in radio communication. Neither censorship in the classical sense—suppression of individual publications on the ground that their content is objectionable—nor establishment by the Commission of a scale of values which would govern the selection of individual programs was thought to be within the power conferred by this section. See 67 Cong. Rec. 12356 (1926); Sen. Rep. No. 772, 69th Cong. Sess. 4 (1926).

The constitutional underpinning of the lower court decision, however, casts grave doubt on the question of whether the Commission or its licensees

[90] As we have shown, proceeding from the assumption that subjects to be covered and speakers to be heard must be determined by someone, a cardinal principle of broadcast operations under the Communications Act has been that a licensee bears ultimate responsibility for all material broadcast over his facilities. See, e.g., 47 U.S.C. § 310(b); P Pub. Co. v. FCC, 94 F.2d 249, 251 (D.C. Cir. 1937); Regents of New Mexico v. Albuquerque Broadcasting Co., 158 F.2d 900, 905–06 (10th Cir. 1947). The only exception to this general policy are broadcasts by candidates for public office where the licensee is forbidden to censor programming in which the candidate appears. 47 U.S.C. § 315(a). In a different sense, one legislative provision (47 U.S.C. § 315(a)) and two administrative regulations (the "personal attack" and "political editorializing" rules approved in Red Lion) circumscribe, in limited situations a licensee's responsive programming determinations. Thus individuals subject to personal attacks have been designated the appropriate spokesmen delivering replies and opposing political candidates have been predesignated as appropriate reply spokesmen to answer political editorials. In each instance, however, the licensee initially responsible for the broadcast generating the reply obligations. Finally, while section 315(a) requires that "equal opportunities" be extended opponents of a qualified candidate, the provision expressly states that "no obligations is imposed under this subsection upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate."

[91] The reasoning of the Court of Appeals clearly appears to suggest that it would be permissible to refuse to sell advertising time on the ground that a similar viewpoint already been adequately presented (App. 471–73) or on the ground that the matter unimportant and that other issues are more deserving of coverage (App. 469).

[96] Center for Law and Social Policy, supra, 23 Pike and Fischer, Radio Regulation at develop substantive standards of these kinds to control the entry of editorial announcements, so as to prevent misleading, scandalous, indecent and "crackpot" statements on social or political issues.[97] The lower court recognized that a "discrimination against all controversial speech—such as we face in these cases—is somewhat less 'odious' than a discrimination among different controversial viewpoints on particular issues."[98] But the court ignored the fact that broadcasters will either have to make discriminatory judgments on the suitability of particular announcements for audiences of all ages and sensibilities, or permit what, in the eyes of the public generally, would be a clear debasement of the broadcast media by speech more appropriately expressed in other places.[99]

It is an unacceptable choice which should convincingly demonstrate that neither the First Amendment nor common sense compels a right of personal access for editorial announcements on all broadcast stations.[100] Indeed, the First Amendment interests of the public as a whole would be disserved by such a development. Rather than enhancing, it would be contrary to First Amendment interests, and a severe if not impossible administrative burden, if broadcasters were compelled to engage in the delicate balancing of constitutional and other interests concerning the acceptability of inflammatory, hateful, "frivolous" and other questionable expressions of opinion by all persons offering to pay for broadcast time.

As a "public trustee" the broadcast licensee has the obligation to select "appropriate spokesmen" to voice "significant" viewpoints on issues of "public importance". But, in implementing the kind of right of access proclaimed by the Court of Appeals, it is not likely that licensees would be permitted to limit access to "significant" views on important subjects. Ironically, the concept of licensee responsibility so fundamental to the system chosen by Congress and the Commission, and upheld by this Court in Red Lion, not only prompts the court below to find constitutional infirmities in the existing regulatory scheme,[101] but is the very component at least partially removed from the new constitutional scheme set in motion.[102]

As we have elsewhere shown, Congress, the Commission and the courts have determined that the central goal of the First Amendment as it applies to broadcasting is to enhance the right of the public to be informed. In these particular cases, the Commission, based on decades of experience in interpreting the statutory public interest standard and administering the fairness doctrine based thereon, carefully articulated the practical and legal basis for such policies and concluded that the public's interest in broadcasting would be best served by declining to compel stations to sell time for the presentation of individual views.[103] Moreover, as the administrative agency entrusted with the task of developing workable policies to govern the allocation and utilization of broadcast frequencies, the Commission is continuing to examine what further adjustments and changes are desirable or possible in fulfilling the spirit of the fairness doctrine.[104] Thus, if deficiencies in the public's First Amendment right to be informed are perceived, they can and should more appropriately be handled through administrative procedures before the Commission which look toward modifications in the existing system and take into account the full complement of related broadcast policies.

[97] The Court of Appeals itself relied upon the difference between "commercial" and "political" speech so far as the permissibility of content regulation is concerned (See, e.g., App. 473 and n.38); but, as we have shown, it ignores the fact that broadcasters actually do regulate the subject matter of commercial announcements and may be called upon to act differently with respect to editorial announcements. For instance, in one of many ironies engendered by the Court of Appeals decision, the First Amendment ground of the opinion would presumably not permit a licensee to reject a brief 10-second announcement that is mere "sloganeering" on the basis that only a longer presentation on the complex issue would contribute to the public's right to be informed.

[99] A public place need be opened for First Amendment-protected expression only to the extent that the speech is presented "in a manner and for a purpose generally consonant with the use to which the property is actually put." Amalgamated Food Employees Local Union 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., 391 U.S. 308, 319–29 (1968).

[100] As we have shown, "differences in the characteristics of news media justify differences in the First Amendment standards applied to them." Red Lion, supra, 395 U.S. at 386, 388. The court of appeals opinion recognizes no distinguishing characteristics of the broadcast media in this sense, and applies the strictest First Amendment tests, including the "clear and present danger" doctrine. App. 475. It is somewhat disconcerting that the lower court decision should end with a reference to Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949), if that is meant as an example of the kind of speech which must be broadcast in spot announcement form to citywide or nationwide captive audiences. The speech there in question, as detailed in Mr. Justice Jackson's dissenting opinion (337 U.S. at 13), involved an inflammatory anti-Semitic harrangue. Distinguishing features of that case are that the speech occurred at an auditorium at which sympathizers gathered inside and a disorderly protesting mob gathered outside; the majority of the Court held, in a 5–4 decision, that the situation could not justify conviction of the scheduled speaker for breach of the peace.

[101] According to the court of appeals, the present system is constitutionally inadequate because it allows broadcasters to "decide what issues are 'important,' how 'fully' to cover them, and the format, time and style of the coverage." (App. 469).

[102] For instance, the court found that the First Amendment interest in self-expression it had formulated could only be vindicated by putting the "crucial controls" for the use of some advertising time in the hands of outside individuals or groups. App. 468–69. Thus, even if broadcasters demonstrate a full exposition of viewpoints and partisan spokesme during non-advertising time, "their retention of total initiative and editorial control i inimical to the First Amendment." App. 469. See also App. 485.

In contrast, the lower court's objective of removing from broadcast licensees and allocating to affluent individuals and groups discretion in some program content selection represents a glaring aberration of the total scheme of broadcast regulation. As we have seen, in a limited-time medium, the paramount right of the public to be informed cannot be meaningfully served by a common-carrier approach in which views and spokesmen are presented on a first-come, first-served basis. Accordingly, Congress and the Commission have determined to treat broadcast licensees as trustees for the public at large with the concomitant responsibility to select the issues and spokesmen to be broadcast. The lower court charts a dramatic departure in attempting to reformulate this system in a manner which diffuses responsibility for program content to individuals and groups who bear neither a journalistic responsibility nor a statutory obligation to serve the public. Consequently, the new regime which is proposed would seriously compromise the vital First Amendment interests at stake by frustrating the ability of radio and television stations to program for the public at large and by leading to increased governmental supervision of broadcast speech.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, the judgment of the court of appeals should be reversed.

Respectfully submitted.

ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

This is a petition to review a "Report and Order" of the Federal Communications Commission adopted on December 15, 1970.[1] The petition requests this Court to review and to reverse a ruling by the FCC that licensed television and radio stations who broadcast anti-smoking messages are not required by the "fairness doctrine" to grant time for the presentation of the opposing viewpoint. Petitioners and the Intervenors named in the margin[2] are manufacturers igarettes; together these companies account for nearly all of the cigarettes nufactured in the United States. Intervenor The Tobacco Institute, Inc. is a intary association of domestic manufacturers of tobacco products. One of the adcasting networks, the American Broadcasting Companies, Inc., has inter- ed in support of the Commission's action.

he issues presented for review are as follows:

. Whether, consistently with Sections 315 and 326 of the Communications t and the First Amendment, the FCC may authorize television and radio tions to broadcast anti-smoking messages without requiring them to pre- t the opposing point of view on the theory that the smoking and health issue ceased to be controversial.

. Whether the Commission's decision that broadcast licensees can take the ition that cigarette smoking is not a controversial issue, thereby relieving h licensees of their obligations under the fairness doctrine, is arbitrary l capricious in light of the Commission's prior rulings, representations to ngress, and public statements on the smoking and health issue.

STATUTES INVOLVED

he statutes involved are set forth in Appendix A to this Brief, pp. 1a–2a, ra.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

) Background Facts

For many years, the Federal Communications Commission has imposed a duty television and radio broadcasters to present both sides of controversial public ues. This obligation—known as the "fairness doctrine"[3]—is based on the atutory requirement that licensees must "operate in the public interest and . . . ord reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues public importance."[4] In September, 1967, the Commission applied the fairness ctrine to the broadcast of cigarette commercials; it ruled that cigarette broad- st advertising presented one side of a controversial issue of public impor- nce—the relationship of smoking to health—and that broadcasters who carried arette advertising were required by the fairness doctrine "to provide a sig- icant amount of time to the other side of this controversial issue of public portance."[5] In compliance with this ruling, a large volume of anti-smoking essages has been broadcast since 1967 by TV and radio licensees on a virtually ily basis. (Joint Appendix 13, cited hereinafter as "J.A.")

In November, 1967, shortly after the foregoing ruling, the Commission in- ructed a licensee that broadcasters who did not carry cigarette advertising it who presented anti-smoking messages were required by the fairness doc- ine to afford time for the presentation of the opposing viewpoint.[6]

All cigarette advertising on the broadcast media terminated on January 2, 71, pursuant to the provisions of Section 6 of the Public Health Cigarette oking Act of 1969, Public Law 91–222, 84 Stat. 89 (1970); Appendix A, p. 2a, fra.

) The Proceedings Before the FCC in This Case

The present case had its genesis in a "Notice of Inquiry" issued by the Com- ission on October 15, 1970, inviting comments from interested parties with re- ect to regulatory policies which the Commission should adopt "Concerning igarette Advertising and Anti-Smoking Presentations." (J.A. 1.) Comments were quested on two specific issues, namely: "(1) the possible fairness doctrine ligations, if any, in the situation where a broadcast licensee, which does not esent cigarette commercials, broadcasts announcements to the general effect at cigarette smoking is hazardous to health and persons should therefore not mmence or continuine smoking . . . and (2) the public interest obligations of the roadcast licensee after January 1, 1971, when all cigarette advertising on roadcast media will cease. . . ." (J.A. 1.)

On December 15, 1970, after receiving comments from various interested parties,[7] the Commission adopted its "Report and Order." (J.A. 3.) The Commission ruled that stations who now broadcast anti-smoking messages are not required by the fairness doctrine to present a different view on the ground that "the general issue of smoking being a health hazard" can reasonably be regarded by licensees as "no longer controversial." (J.A. 8.)

The Commission proceeded from the premise that "it is up to the licensee to make a reasonable good faith judgment on the basis of the particular facts before him as to the possible application of the fairness doctrine, and specifically whether he has presented one side of a controversial issue of public importance." (J.A. 7.) The Commission noted that some broadcasters who had filed comments in response to the "Notice of Inquiry" had "stated their belief", in reliance on "prior Commission precedents", that "fairness would require the presentation of pro-smoking viewpoints" if anti-smoking messages were broadcast. Other broadcasters contended in their comments that, upon the termination of broadcast cigarette advertising, "the general issue of cigarettes being a health hazard can reasonably now be regarded as no longer a controversial one." (J.A. 7-8.) The Commission concluded that it would "decline to upset that [latter] judgment as unreasonable." (J.A. 8.)

The Commission emphasized that its "holding is directed to only one general aspect, albeit a most important one—that cigarette smoking is a hazard to public health. . . . While that fact may now be adjudged by the broadcaster no longer to be a controversial issue, there can clearly be most substantial controversies as to other aspects (e.g., particular studies or statistics; what remedial actions should be taken). As to such aspects, the fairness doctrine would be applicable. . . ." (J.A. 9; emphasis in original.)[8]

It had been pointed out in various comments that the Commission itself had consistently maintained since 1967 that the smoking question presented a controversial issue of public importance. With respect to this point, the Commission stated that "we believe that little is gained here by citation of previous Commission rulings or by reference to past testimony before the Congress. The critical issue is the licensee's judgment today—directed to the circumstances before him." (J.A. 7; emphasis in original.)

The Commission rejected the argument that its refusal to require broadcasters to present replies to anti-smoking messages was inconsistent with its prior ruling, upheld on review,[9] that broadcasters were required to balance cigarette commercials with anti-smoking messages. (J.A. 10–11.) It also rejected the contentions that its decision would involve "the official government view dominating public broadcasting" and "a discriminatory refusal to require the licensee to broadcast certain views which have been denied access to the airwaves," in violation of the First Amendment and the Communications Act, as interpreted in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969). (J.A. 10.)

As to the second question raised in its "Notice of Inquiry"—the public interest obligations of broadcasters with respect to the smoking and health issue following the cessation of cigarette broadcast advertising—the Commission ruled that licensees would not be obliged after January 1, 1971, to continue to devote a significant amount of time each week to anti-cigarette messages. The Commission added, however, (i) that licensees are obligated to present some programming on "matters of great public concern" and (ii) that cigarette smoking is such a matter. (J.A. 15.) The Commission held that although licensees have discretion in determining the manner and extent of their presentation of the anti-smoking viewpoint, "the question whether the licensee who fails to treat this subject has served the public is one which can be definitvely assessed only at [license] renewal time when the licensee's overall public service performance effort is evaluated." (J.A. 17; emphasis in original.)

Commissioner Robert T. Bartley concurred in the Commission's judgment that licensees had discretion to determine whether to cover the smoking and health issue after cigarette advertising ceased and to determine if the issue was controversial; he did not express any opinion on the controversial nature of the smoking and health issue. (J.A. 20.) Commissioner H. Rex Lee "concurred in the result" reached by the Commission without filing a written opinion. (J.A. 44.) Commissioner Nicholas Johnson filed a separate opinion, concurring in part and dissenting in part. (J.A. 21.)

ARGUMENT

Summary Statement of Petitioners' Position

The basic issue in this case is whether a deviation should be permitted from the principle that broadcasters who present one side of a controversial issue are obligated to present the other side. So far as we can determine, the present case is the first instance in which the Commission has relieved broadcasters from their fairness doctrine obligations on the theory that a widely discussed issue is noncontroversial.

Petitioners submit as follows:

First, under the Communications Act, broadcast licensees who present one side of a controversial issue of public importance must furnish an opportunty for presentation of a differing view.

Second, prior to the present case, the Commission had repeatedly and consistently stated in decisions, public announcements, and in statements to Congress that smoking and health is a controversial issue subject to the requirements of the fairness doctrine. This conclusion was the cornerstone of the Commission's landmark decision requiring broadcasters to balance cigarette commercials with anti-smoking messages. It was also the basis for the Commission's 1967 ruling that broadcasters who did not carry cigarette commercials but who aired anti-smoking messages were required by the fairness doctrine to present the opposing view. The Commission's present decision does not state any reasoned basis for suddenly repudiating all of its previous announcements.

Third, the Commission's decision violates the First Amendment. It involves a discriminatory refusal by the FCC to require broadcast licensees to present views differing from the official government view. As a result, the listening public will be deprived of a balanced presentation on an important issue, and the public's ability to make informed judgments on the smoking issue will be prejudiced.

Finally, the Commission's action is arbitrary and capricious. The Commission disregarded all of its prior precedents and pronouncements on the application of the fairness doctrine to the smoking and health issue, and it failed to articulate any objective standard for determining when a subject ceases to be controversial for purposes of the fairness doctrine.

In sum, it is our position that if TV and radio stations grant free time for the broadcast of anti-smoking messages, they must also grant free time in conformity with the fairness doctrine for discussion of a differing viewpoint. In the presentation of this contrary view, cigarette brands may not be advertised or promoted, but evidence and arguments counter to those of cigarette critics are entitled to be expressed.

I. Broadcasters Presenting Programming on Controversial Issues of Public Importance Are Required To Present Both Sides Fairly

Broadcast licensees have been required for many years to comply faithfully with the fairness doctrine. The Commission first expressed the fundamental principle of the fairness doctrine in 1949 in its Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F.C.C. 1246:

> "[In the] presentation of news and comment the public interest requires that the licensee must operate on a basis of overall fairness, making his facilities available for the expression of the contrasting views of all responsible elements in the community on the various issues which arise. . . .
> "[B]roadcast licensees have an affirmative duty generally to encourage and implement the broadcast of all sides of controversial public issues on their facilities. . . ."

This principle was subsequently embodied in Section 315(a) of the Communications Act, which provides that broadcasters have a duty "to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance." 47 U.S.C. § 315(a), as amended 73 Stat. 557 (1959).[10]

[10] The legislative history of Section 315, described by the Supreme Court in Red Lion Broadcasting Co., supra, 395 U.S. at 383–84, demonstrates that Congress intended that broadcasters would be required to give adequate coverage to public issues and that such coverage should fairly reflect contrasting views. The Senate Report on Section 315 noted that "Every licensee who is fortunate in obtaining a license is mandated to operate in the public interest and has assumed the obligation of presenting important public questions fairly and without bias." S. Rep. No. 562, 86th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 8–9 (1959), quoted in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, supra, 395 U.S. at 383.

The basis of the fairness doctrine, as the Supreme Court stated in Red Lion Broadcasting Co., supra, 395 U.S. at 394, is that licensees have been "given the privilege of using scarce radio frequencies as proxies for the entire community. . . ." A licensee is required, the Court stated, "to conduct himself as a proxy or fiduciary with obligations to present those views and voices which are representative of his community and which would otherwise, by necessity, be barred from the airwaves." Id. at 389. The fairness doctrine guarantees "the promotion of informed decisionmaking by the public by insuring that the facts and arguments relevant to decision are made available to the listening audience." Retail Store Employees Union v. FCC, D.C. Cir., No. 22,608, Oct. 27, 1970, slip opinion p. 17.

It was these considerations which prompted the Commission to state recently:

> "[W]e regard strict adherence to the fairness doctrine as the single most important requirement of operation in the public interest—the 'sine qua non' for grant of a renewal of license . . . . We have stressed that we have allocated so much spectrum space to broadcasting because of the contribution which it can make to an informed public . . . . That basic allocation purpose would be largely undermined if the broadcaster could discuss such issues unfairly—by presenting only one side or only the viewpoints with which he agreed." In re Complaints of Committee for the Fair Broadcasting of Controversial Issues, 25 F.C.C. 2d 283, 292 (1970).

Licensees have heretofore been accorded considerable discretion in determining in the first instance what matters of public interest should be dealt with from among the multitude of such issues competing for broadcast time.[11] However, once a licensee has presented a point of view on a public issue, the fairness doctrine is applicable, and contrasting views must be presented.[12]

Prior to the present case, the Commission had consistently required the presentation of divergent viewpoints. The fairness doctrine has been applied to a wide variety of "controversial" issues, including "the fluoridation of drinking water, the value of krebiozen in the treatment of cancer, the nutritive qualities of white bread, . . . the use of high potency vitamins,"[13] the sale of alcohol,[14] the regulation of private aviation,[15] and, as we discuss below, the smoking and health issue.

II. The Broadcasters' Obligation To Present Contrasting Views on Important Public Issues Applies to the Smoking and Health Controversy

(a) Prior to the present decision, the Commission had consistently held that the fairness doctrine applies to the smoking and health issue. In 1967, the Commission ruled that stations who carried cigarette advertising were presenting one side of a controversial issue and they accordingly had an obligation under the fairness doctrine to present the contrasting point of view, as an aspect of their duty to operate in the public interest. In the Matter of Television Station WCBS-TV, New York, N.Y. Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine to Cigarette Advertising, 9 F.C.C. 2d 921 (1967), aff'd sub nom. Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F.2d 1082 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1969).

Several months after its decision in Banzhaf, supra, the Commission notified a licensee that a broadcaster who did not carry cigarette advertising but did carry anti-smoking messages was obliged, under the fairness doctrine, to present the opposing viewpoint. Letter to Larry Jonas, November 2, 1967, 8330-S, C9-1304, reprinted in Appendix B, pp. 3a-5a, infra. The Commission said:

[11] The Commission stated in promulgating its Policy on Programming:

> "The ascertainment of the needed elements of the broadcast matter to be provided by a particular licensee for the audience he is obligated to serve remains primarily the function of the licensee. His honest and prudent judgments will be accorded great weight by the Commission. Indeed, any other course would tend to substitute the judgment of the Commission for that of the licensee." 20 P & F Radio Reg. 1901, 1913–14 (1960). See also Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, supra, 13 F.C.C. at 1250–51.

[12] The Commission has stated that "Only where the licensee's discretion in the choice of the particular programs to be broadcast over his facilities is exercised so as to afford a reasonable opportunity for the presentation of all responsible positions on matters of sufficient importance to be afforded radio time can radio be maintained as a medium of freedom of speech for the people as a whole." Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, supra, 13 F.C.C. at 1250.

[13] In the Matter of an Inquiry into Compliance with Section 317 of the Communications Act of 1934, as Amended, and with the Commission's Policy on the Presentation of Opposing Viewpoints on Controversial Issues of Public Importance by Licensees Broadcasting the Program "Living Should Be Fun," 33 F.C.C. 101, 107 (1962).

[15] In re Complaints Concerning National Broadcasting Co., Fairness Doctrine Relating to General and Commercial Aviation, 19 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 137 (1970).

> "The Commission has recognized that there is a controversial issue of public importance involved here—the possible effect of cigarette smoking on health. Thus the fairness doctrine is applicable. The initial judgment, as you have noted, as to whether the presentation of material regarding cigarettes is in the public interest is one for the licensee to make. . . . However, having presented a view on the issue, the licensee may not prevent the presentation of opposing views on the ground he personally does not believe them to be in the public interest. Rather, the Commission is of the view that when a reasonable opportunity is afforded for the presentation of opposing views on an issue of public importance, so that all facts relating to the controversy are exposed, the public will have the benefit of full information concerning it." Id., p. 1; Appendix, pp. 3a-4a, infra.

The Commission reiterated its position in a public notice, issued on December 15, 1967, in which it stated that the licensee's duty to present opposing views in the "situation of a station which presents health hazard claims but no cigarette commercials . . . would be governed by the same principles as are applicable generally under the 'Fairness Doctrine.'" Tobacco Institute, Inc., 11 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 987, 988 (1967).

Prior to the present case, the Commission repeatedly and consistently stated in unequivocal terms that the smoking and health issue is controversial, and that any presentation of the issue is subject to the fairness doctrine. Thus, in its 1967 rulings applying the fairness doctrine to cigarette advertising the Commission said:

> "We believe that a station which presents such advertisements has the duty of informing its audience of the other side of this controversial issue of public importance—that however enjoyable, such smoking may be a hazard to the smoker's health." Letter to Television Station WCBS-TV, New York, New York, 9 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1423, 1424 (1967).

* * * * * * *

> "[H]ere the controversial issue posed is one of health hazard. . . ." Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine to Cigarette Advertising, supra 9 F.C.C. 2d at 941.

In its brief filed in 1968 with the Court of Appeals in support of its cigarette advertising decision, the Commission said:

> "We believe that all parties would agree, however, that a public controversy of major dimensions presently surrounds the subject of cigarette smoking." Brief of Appellee, p. 15, Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F. 2d 1082 (D.C. Cir. 1968).[16]

These views were reiterated by the Commission's Chairman in the recent Congressional hearings which resulted in enactment of the Public Health Cigarette Smoking Act of 1969, Public Law 91-222, 84 Stat. 87 (1970). Chairman Hyde, testifying on behalf of the Commission before the Consumer Subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee, clearly stated that, after cigarette advertising went off the air, the fairness doctrine would require a balanced presentation of the issue:

> "Senator Moss. Something was said this morning about there might be a turnaround of the fairness doctrine the other way; that in the event there were a number of these educational, antismoking showings, that perhaps there ought to be a right of the tobacco industry to come in the fairness doctrine and state its pro side over again.
> "What is your response to that?
> "Mr. Hyde. There may well be an advantage in that, Senator. Let me explain. The fairness doctrine in principle holds that the public is entitled to hear both sides of the proposition or both sides of the issue which is controversial, and affects the public interest.

---

[16] It is noteworthy that John Banzhaf and ASH—the principal proponents of the 1967 fairness doctrine ruling on cigarette advertising—acknowledged the controversial nature of the smoking and health issue in papers filed by them with the Commission in this proceeding. In their "Petition for Rule Making," filed on October 13, 1970, they stated:

> "Could one possibly find—particularly in the absence of any testimony or evidence—that this issue is no longer controversial or of public importance." (Record, p. 15.)

Similarly, in comments filed in response to the "Notice of Inquiry," Banzhaf and ASH noted that a finding that the smoking issue is no longer controversial "would be clearly contrary to fact and logic." (Record, p. 148.)

> "Now, it is quite possible that, if a station carries an anticigarette smoking presentation, that more attention could be attracted to that presentation if you had the other side of the argument available at the same time.
> "What I am suggesting is that a good, sharp argument might attract more attention than a presentation of simply one side of the issue.
> "Senator Moss. For that reason you wouldn't necessarily oppose the statement of the pro side if the anti side was permitted to continue?
> "Mr. Hyde. That is right. But let me indicate how this operates.
>
> "The fairness doctrine says that if a station presents one side of . . . a controversial issue of public importance, they must provide some reasonable opportunity for the presentation of other viewpoints.
> "Now, assuming there is no cigarette advertising as such, but simply a presentation of what we might classify as an educational presentation to discourage the use of a product which the Surgeon General has found harmful to health. In that situation fairness would require that there be some reasonable opportunity for the presentation of the other viewpoint as long as this remains in controversy." Hearings on H.R. 6543 Before the Consumer Subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., p. 160 (1969).

Chairman Hyde repeated this view during a colloquy with Senator Cotton:

> "I presume that if the matter comes up in the context of an educational program warning the public about the hazards of cigarette smoking, that then any demands for opportunities to present the opposing viewpoint would be handled in somewhat the same way, that a spokesman for the other point of view would be given some reasonable opportunity, but not necessarily equal time." Id. at 162.

Chairman Hyde was equally explicit on this point in his testimony before the House Commerce Committee, as is shown by the following colloquy:

> "Mr. Friedel. If we were to ban advertising of cigarettes, should we then also ban anticigarette warnings under the application of the fairness doctrine?
> "Mr. Hyde. No, I believe not. If we were to ban the advertising of cigarettes on radio and TV, it would still be appropriate for a station to, as a public service, carry information about the health hazard involved in the use of cigarettes, and if they did that, they would be subject, under the fairness doctrine, to the duty of making some reasonable provision for the presentation of the other side of the argument. This would not be in the form of advertising. It could be in the discussion of the issue by persons who would have a different viewpoint." Hearings on H.R. 643 Before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., p. 209 (1969).

The Commission Chairman further stated:

> "Mr. Watson. Now as I understood earlier, you stated that even if your proposed ban should become effective, that you would still want the stations to carry the public service advertisements against smoking.
> "Did I understand you correctly?
> "Mr. Hyde. I think I said that they might very well carry such materials as the public service, and that if they did, they would be required under the fairness doctrine to provide some appropriate opportunity for the discussion of the other side of the issue." Id. at 226.

In sum, it is beyond dispute that prior to the instant decision, it was the Commission's position, repeatedly reiterated, that (i) smoking and health is a controversial issue of public importance, and (ii) that a broadcast licensee who presents one side of this issue is required by the fairness doctrine to present a contrasting view.

(b) In its "Report and Order", the Commission's stated basis for repudiating its own precedents and pronouncements is that "the general issue of smoking being a health hazard is no longer controversial" and that a judgment of a broadcaster to this effect will not be set aside by the Commission as "unreasonable." (J.A. 8.) As we have just shown, the foregoing conclusion is inconsistent with numerous Commission statements. The arguments advanced by the Commission for the sudden turn-about in its views will not survive scrutiny.

First, in support of its conclusion that smoking and health has ceased to be a controversial issue, the Commission stated that "there have been most significant developments since the Surgeon General's 1964 Report which touched off a substantial controversy." (J.A. 8.) The first of these "developments" cited by the Commission was various studies on cigarette smoking which had been reported to Congress in 1967, 1968, and 1969 by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in compliance with the provisions of the 1965 Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act.[17] (J.A. 8.) The short answer is that the 1967 and 1968 HEW reports were public knowledge prior to the Commission's representations to Congress in 1969 that smoking and health is a controversial issue to which the fairness doctrine applies. There is no suggestion in the Commission's decision that the 1969 HEW report made any dramatic change in the state of knowledge on the smoking and health controversy. Moreover, the three HEW reports cannot be cited to support silencing debate since they were themselves the subject of heated controversy.

A report by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—the governmental body to whom HEW was required by law to submit these three reports—demonstrates that Congress did not believe there had been any "significant developments" since 1964 establishing the proposition that smoking is hazardous to health beyond reasonable dissent and dispute. In 1969, that Committee held extensive hearings on bills which, as modified, were enacted as the Public Health Cigarette Smoking Act of 1969. The Committee stated in its report:

> "On the basis of these hearings the committee concludes that nothing new has been determined with respect to the relationship between cigarette smoking and human health since its hearings in 1964 and 1965. The arguments pro and con with respect to cigarettes are the same now as then, though supported by a larger statistical base. The 1964 report of the Surgeon General's Advisory Committee on Smoking and Health remains the principal basis for efforts to regulate the labeling and advertising of cigarettes." H.R. Rep. No. 91–289, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., p. 5 (1969).

Second, as a further basis for its decision, the Commission noted that the caution notice which had appeared on cigarette packages in compliance with the 1965 Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act—"Caution: Cigarette Smoking May Be Hazardous To Your Health"—had been changed by Congress in the 1969 Act to read as follows: "Warning: The Surgeon General Has Determined That Cigarette Smoking Is Dangerous To Your Health." (J.A. 8.) The Commission's conclusion that the smoking and health issue has ceased to be controversial certainly does not follow from this amendment in the phrasing of the caution notice. There is not a shred of evidence in the legislative history relating to this change which shows that Congress intended thereby to displace the fairness doctrine as it applied to the smoking and health controversy. To the contrary, Congress had been assured by the Commission Chairman that the fairness doctrine would remain operative after cigarette advertising ended.

The fact that the Surgeon General believes smoking is dangerous to health is certainly not a new "development". The Surgeon General has maintained that position since the issuance of the Report of his Advisory Committee in 1964. His statements and reports, however, are not conclusive either in fact or law on the issue of smoking and health. An active controversy continues on the relationship of smoking to health. Responsible scientists maintain that the smoking question is an "open" one and that smoking has not been proved to cause the diseases and conditions which are claimed to be statistically associated with smoking; that there has been no agent identified in cigarette smoke which, as found in smoke, has been established as causing any of the diseases claimed to be statistically associated with smoking; and that there are defects in the statistical studies which report associations between smoking and mortality or morbidity. A number of eminent physicians and scientists testified to this effect during hearings in 1969 before the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. See, e.g., Hearings on H.R. 643 Before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 740–808, 849–92, 930–60, 1018–41, 1080–1127, 1255–71 (1969). The Surgeon General himself has recognized that not all the facts about smoking and health are known and that there is "disagreement" with his position. Id. at 180. Whether the Surgeon General or the scientists who disagree with him are correct is not the question. What is important is that there are responsible spokesmen with conflicting points of view, and the public has an interest in hearing differing viewpoints.

Moreover, the Commission itself has acknowledged that the Surgeon General's views do not foreclose dissent. In 1969, when the Commission proposed to issue a rule to ban cigarette broadcast advertising, it stated in its Notice of Proposed Rule Making:

[17] Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act, § 5(d)(1), 79 Stat. 283, 15 U.S.C. § 1334(d)(1) (Supp. V, 1965–69).

> "While many health authorities now regard the matter as settled . . . [their] reports obviously cannot be regarded as barring dissent thereto, or the presentation of contrary views." In the Matter of Amendment of Part 73 of The Federal Communications Commission Rules With Regard to the Advertisement of Cigarettes, 16 F.C.C. 2d 284, 291 n. 30 (1969).

Indeed, even in its present decision, the Commission acknowledged that "there can clearly be most substantial controversies" as to various "aspects" of the smoking and health issue such as "particular studies or statistics" and "'what remedial action should be taken." (J.A. 9.) The Commission ruled that "as to such aspects, the fairness doctrine would be applicable. . . ." (Id.) This arbitrary attempt to divide the smoking and health issue into controversial and noncontroversial "aspects" is untenable. The possible relationship of smoking to health can only be determined by reference to specific studies. The various reports of the Surgeon General which the Commission relies upon are essentially collations of a number of specific studies and statistical reports. There is sharp controversy surrounding the evidence, the methodology, and the conclusions of these studies. It is absurd to state that the conclusion that smoking is hazardous to health is not controversial, while the premises leading to this conclusion—the evidence, methodology, and results of the underlying studies—are controversial. It is apparent, we submit, that the entire question of the relationship of smoking and health is still embroiled in controversy.

Third, the Commission professes to find it "difficult to reconcile the cigarette industry's acquiescence in the 1969 [Congressional] ban [on cigarette broadcast advertising], with its contention here" that a broadcaster who presents anti-smoking messages should present a contrasting viewpoint. (J.A. 8-9.) There is no evidence, however, that the "cigarette industry" has ever acquiesced in a decision sanctioning the broadcast of anti-smoking messages without a corresponding duty on the part of licensees to present the other side. Indeed, the "cigarette industry," together with Congress and the general public, was led to believe, by the unambiguous representations made to Congress on behalf of the Commission by Chairman Hyde, pp. 15-18, supra, that after cigarette broadcast advertising ceased, the fairness doctrine would apply to any presentation of the smoking and health issue.

Finally, the Commission relied in its decision upon the following excerpt from the opinion of the Court of Appeals in Banzhaf v. FCC, supra, 405 F. 2d at 1103:

> "[T]he Commission did not abuse its discretion in refusing to require rebuttal time for the cigarette manufacturers. The public health rationale which supports the principal ruling would hardly justify compelling broadcasters to inform the public that smoking might not be dangerous. . . ." (J.A. 12; emphasis in original.)

It is true that the Commission and the Court held in Banzhaf that stations that carried cigarette advertising were not also required to present rebuttals to the counter-balancing anti-smoking messages they were required to broadcast. But this was based on the premise that "a licensee who has carried cigarette commercials has extensively covered one side of the issue." Letter to Metromedia, Inc., from Ben Waple, Secretary, FCC, FCC 67-1074, September 21, 1967. There was no issue before the Court of Appeals in Banzhaf concerning the fairness doctrine obligations of licensees who presented anti-smoking messages in a situation where there was no cigarette advertising. See Tobacco Institute, Inc., 11 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 987 (1967). The Court's statement as to the right of rebuttal given such advertising does not in any way support the conclusion that the right of reply to anti-smoking messages is to be denied in the absence of such advertising.

The Court of Appeals' decision in Banzhaf does not support the Commission's ruling in the instant matter. To the contrary, the logic of the opinion in Banzhaf is that both sides must be granted an opportunity to present their point of view to the public. If the cigarette advertising considered in Banzhaf obligated licensees to broadcast the anti-smoking side of the issue, the converse must also be true: the broadcast of anti-smoking messages, absent advertising, creates a correlative duty to present the other side.

The Commission did not enunciate any valid basis for rejecting all its prior rulings and statements that smoking and health is a controversial issue subject to the fairness doctrine. We submit that it remains a controversial issue. There is no basis for finding that this issue is so settled as to render the fairness doctrine inapplicable.

III. The Commission's Ruling Violates the First Amendment and Section 326 of the Communications Act.

The fairness doctrine is rooted in the First Amendment. As the Commission recently stated:

> "[W]e remain firmly convinced that the fairness doctrine is workable and does promote robust, wideopen debate. Again, no extended discussion is needed on this score, in light of the Red Lion opinion, where the [Supreme] Court indicated that the fairness doctrine is not only constitutional but may well be constitutionally required . . . ." In re Complaints of Committee for the Fair Broadcasting of Controversial Issues, supra, 25 F.C.C. 2d at 292. (The word "is" italicized in original.)

In Red Lion Broadcasting Co., supra, the Court, in discussing the relationship of the fairness doctrine to the First Amendment, stated:

> "It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount. . . . It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail. . . . It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, aesthetic, moral and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here. That right may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the FCC." 395 U.S. at 390.[18]

We submit that in the present case the Commission has overstepped the limits imposed by the First Amendment in two respects:

First, as the Supreme Court pointed out in Red Lion, Commission action in the fairness doctrine area could conflict with the constitutional guarantee of free speech if it involved "a discriminatory refusal to require the licensee to broadcast certain views which have been denied access to the airwaves. . . ." 395 U.S. at 396. Before January 2, 1971, a station which carried cigarette commercials was required to present anti-smoking messages in order to inform "its audience of the other side of this controversial issue of public importance. . . ." Letter to Television Station WCBS-TV, supra, 9 P & F Radio Reg. 2d at 1424. Commencing January 2, 1971, a station which carries anti-smoking messages has not been required to inform "its audience of the other side." The Commission insisted on balanced treatment of the smoking and health issue before January 2, 1971; it responded to the demands of anti-smoking critics that their views should be presented. However, since January 2, 1971, the Commission has not required balanced presentation, and it has rejected the contention that the opposing views, including those expressed by eminent scientists and physicians, are also entitled to be presented. This one-sided administration of the fairness doctrine blockades the public's right to hear a balanced presentation on this controversy.

Second, in its decision in the present case, the Commission cautioned broadcasters that "the question whether the licensee who fails to treat this subject [i.e., a licensee who does not carry anti-smoking messages] has served the public is one which can be definitively assessed only at renewal time when the licensee's overall public service performance effort is evaluated." (J.A. 17; emphasis in original.) This is a thinly veiled warning to licensees that they must broadcast "the official government view" on the smoking issue and that failure to do so will prejudice applications for renewal of their licenses to broadcast.[19] See Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, supra, 395 U.S. at 396.

Let it be assumed, for purposes of discussion, that there are some transcendent issues confronting a community to which the Commission may require a broadcaster to devote time. It does not follow that the Commission may properly insist that one side of such issues be presented without requiring that the opposing view be afforded opportunity for expression. Governmental compulsion to present one point of view infringes free speech no less than censorship. This is especially true where compulsion is exerted to require dissemination of the "official government view"—in the present case, the view of the Surgeon General. It is the purpose of the First Amendment to protect the public against the propagation by mass media of an official government stand on any issue.

[18] The Supreme Court has consistently stressed that the First Amendment "rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public . . . ." Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945). See, e.g., Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

[19] The Communications Act of 1934 prohibits broadcasting by any person unless he has been licensed by the FCC. Section 301, 48 Stat. 1081, 47 U.S.C. § 301. Licenses can be issued or renewed for a period of not more than three years. Section 307(d), 48 Stat. 1083, as amended, 47 U.S.C. § 307(d). The statutory standard to be applied in determining whether initially to grant or renew a license is "the public interest, convenience, and necessity." Section 309(a), 48 Stat. 1085, 47 U.S.C. § 309(a). In considering whether to ren a license, the FCC reviews a licensee's past performance. This life or death power over enterprise effectively compels a broadcast licensee to adhere closely in his operations the view of the public interest expressed by the Commission.

The Commission is expressly prohibited by Section 326 of the Communications Act from exercising the "power of censorship" and from interfering with "the right of free speech" on the airwaves. Communications Act of 1934, as amended, 62 Stat. 862 (1948), 47 U.S.C. § 326. The Commission cannot permit its own views as to the "social value" of programs or issues to govern its interpretation of the public interest. FCC v. American Broadcasting Co., 347 U.S. 284, 297 (1954). Nor can the Commission prevent the utterance on the air of statements it considers erroneous or offensive. Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith v. FCC, 403 F.2d 169 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 394 U.S. 930 (1969).[20] To the contrary, the Commission is under an affirmative duty to ensure that broadcasters "afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance." Communications Act of 1934, § 315(a), as amended, 73 Stat. 557 (1959), 47 U.S.C. § 315(a). The ruling in the present case violates this obligation.

IV. The Commission's Ruling Is Arbitrary and Capricious.

As we have discussed, the Commission's decision in the present case cannot be reconciled either with its prior fairness doctrine decisions generally or with its precedents and pronouncements concerning the obligations of broadcast licensees in connection with the smoking and health controversy. The Commission attempted to brush aside all of its previous rulings and statements by asserting: "[W]e believe that little is gained here by citation of previous Commission rulings or by references to past testimony before the Congress." (J.A. 7.) We submit, however, that precedents and prior representations cannot be so readily dismissed.

It is, of course, basic that an administrative agency cannot adopt special, ad hoc rules good for only one case. As Judge Brown of the Fifth Circuit has put it:

> "[L]aw does not permit an agency to grant to one person the right to do that which it denies to another similarly situated. There may not be a rule for Monday, another for Tuesday, a rule for general application, but denied outright in a specific case." Mary Carter Paint Co. v. FTC, 333 F. 2d 654, 660 (5th Cir. 1964) (concurring opinion), rev'd on other grounds, 382 U.S. 46 (1965).

See also City of Chicago v. FPC, 385 F.2d 629 (D.C. Cir. 1967), cert. denied sub nom. Public Serv. Comm'n of Wisconsin v. FPC, 390 U.S. 945 (1968).

In NLRB v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 270 F. 2d 167 (4th Cir. 1959), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 943 (1960), this Court applied this principle to inconsistent rules applied by the NLRB to craft representation and held that objective standards had to be applied to parties similarly situated, unless the agency could clearly set forth a basis for the deviation from those standards. The Court said:

> "Conceivably such a decision could be justified by the circumstances of a given case, but in this instance it must be condemned as discriminatory, in view of the conflicting policy and action of the Board . . . under precisely similar circumstances in certain selected fields." 270 F.2d at 174.

The FCC is, of course, subject to the requirement that standards must be consistently and evenly applied. Melody Music, Inc. v. FCC, 345 F.2d 730 (D.C. Cir. 1965); Hall v. FCC, 237 F.2d 567 (D.C. Cir. 1956).

[20] In its opinion in the cited case, the Commission clearly recognized the restrictions imposed upon it:

> "Individual Commissioners joining in this opinion have the strongest personal feelings against the views represented by the assailed broadcasts . . . but believe that the action of the Commission must be governed by legal principles rather than the personal feelings of the Commissioners. . . .
> "The Commission has long held that its function is not to judge the merit, wisdom, or accuracy of any broadcast discussion or commentary but to insure that all viewpoints are given fair and equal opportunity for expression and that controverted allegations are balanced by the presentation of opposing viewpoints. . . .
> "In broadcasting it is required that controverted or controversial matters be subject to fair and adequate opportunities for reply by those of differing viewpoints." In the Matter of Complaint of Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith Against Station KTYM, Inglewood, Calif., 4 F.C.C. 2d 190-92 (1966).

It is also axiomatic that an administrative agency must "articulate with reasonable clarity its reasons for decision, and identify the significance of the crucial facts, a course that tends to assure that the agency's policies effectuate general standards, applied without unreasonable discrimination." Greater Boston Television Corp. v. FCC, D.C. Cir., No. 17,785, Nov. 13, 1970, slip opinion, pp. 17–18.

The foregoing principles were violated here.

First, the Commission did not express any objective standard for determining when an issue may be deemed noncontroversial within the meaning of the fairness doctrine.

Second, the Commission did not adequately explain why an issue it had consistently held to be controversial was suddenly to be consigned to the "noncontroversial" category.

Third, the Commission did not explain why the public is not entitled to hear contrasting views on the smoking and health issue although the public must hear both sides of such issues as the nutritive value of white bread and the use of high potency vitamins.

The Commission in this case has abandoned the neutral position which it is required to take with respect to the merits of controversial public issues, although it has previously recognized that it is not the "proper arbiter of scientific and medical issue[s]." See Banzhaf v. FCC, supra, 405 F.2d at 1097–98 n. 64. The Commission, of course, has no scientific expertise which qualifies it to pass upon the medical, statistical, and other scientific aspects of the smoking and health controversy. Nevertheless, the Commission has decided, in effect, that the anti-smoking argument is "right," and that the public therefore need not be exposed to a conflicting view.

The Commission cannot allow its own whim to govern the resolution of this important question essential to the application of the fairness doctrine but must apply "general standards . . . without unreasonable discrimination." Greater Boston Television Corp. v FCC, supra at 17–18. If the Commission deviates from its own standards it must show why this is relevant "to the purposes of the Federal Communications Act." Melody Music, Inc. v. FCC, supra, 345 F.2d at 733. The Commission has failed in its responsibility to articulate and apply neutral standards in application of the fairness doctrine, and its decision is invalid on this ground.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the ruling of the Commission under review should be declared unlawful and invalid.

Respectfully submitted.

Section 326 of the Communications Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 1091, as amended, 62 Stat. 862 (1948), 47 U.S.C. § 326, provides:

AIR MAIL

Mr. Larry Jonas,
KBCM-FM
2895 Hilyard
Eugene, Oreg. 97405

Dear Mr. Jonas:

This refers to your letter of September 25, 1967, wherein you advise us that you do not broadcast tobacco advertisements but do broadcast warnings as to the effect of smoking on health. As you have a request for broadcast time to present the other side of the controversy—material proposed by proponents of smoking—you inquire concerning your obligations under the fairness doctrine.

The Commission has recognized that there is a controversial issue of public importance involved here—the possible effect of cigarette smoking on health. Thus the fairness doctrine is applicable. The initial judgment, as you have noted, as to whether the presentation of material regarding cigarettes is in the public interest is one for the licensee to make. (See also the Commission's Public Notice of September 8, 1967, paragraph 64.) However, having presented a view on the issue, the licensee may not prevent the presentation of opposing views on the ground he personally does not believe them to be in the public interest. Rather, the Commission is of the view that when a reasonable opportunity is afforded for the presentation of opposing views on an issue of public importance, so that all facts relating to the controversy are exposed, the public will have the benefit of full information concerning it. This position was set forth in paragraph 6 of the 1949 Editorializing Report:

> "And we have recognized, with respect to such programs, the paramount right of the public in a free society to be informed and to have presented to it for acceptance or rejection the different attitudes and viewpoints concerning those vital and often controversial issues which are held by the various groups which make up the community. It is this right of the public to be informed, rather than any right on the part of the Government, any broadcast licensee or any individual member of the public to broadcast his own particular views on any matter, which is the foundation stone of the American system of broadcasting."

We wish to make clear, however, that it is up to the licensee to make a good faith reasonable judgment as to what is required based on all of the facts. Thus, in the circumstance here, he must determine whether, taking into account all of the programming on his station over a considerable period of time (e.g., advertising, news, public affairs, etc.) and his future plans, there has been, or will be, a reasonable balance between pro-smoking and anti-smoking points of view. As you know, equal time is not required in the fairness area. If the licensee makes a bona fide judgment that one side has not received a reasonable amount of time, he has discretion to decide whether he wishes to present information concerning the other side of the controversy himself, or if not, to choose an appropriate spokesman and the format (e.g., forum discussions, short talk programs, news coverage, etc.). Your attention is further called to Questions and Answers 12–16 in the enclosed fairness doctrine "Primer."

We hope this will help to explain your obligations with respect to this matter.

Very truly yours,

BEN F. WAPLE.
Secretary.

MISCELLANEOUS

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE OF THE JUDICIARY,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR ———: The Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights is undertaking a broad study of the state of freedom of the press in America. Recent developments, including the subpoenaing of journalists by grand juries and Congressional Committees, efforts to secure injunctions against certain newspapers, the use of assumed press credentials for investigative "covers", and new fears about the use of broadcast licensing for intimidation and censorship, have brought into sharp relief existing concern about the relationship between government and the press. In my judgment, these events underline the importance of a comprehensive and thoughtful Congressional examination of the meaning and vitality of the free press in contemporary America.

In this connection, I am writing to you and other persons who have an appreciation for these matters for suggestions as to the issues and problems to which the Subcommittee should direct its attention. Your suggestions will enable the Subcommittee's study to reflect a broad range of views and interests. They will be especially important as the Subcommittee looks to hearings on this subject later this year.

The Subcommittee is concerned with the application of the First Amendment to both the printed press and the broadcast press. We are interested in the relationship between all three branches of the government and the press. In discovering the problems and defining the issues, we intend to examine legislative and other proposals for resolving the conflicts which have emerged in recent years. Preserving the principle and renewing the spirit of the First Amendment is the Subcommittee's paramount concern. A greater public appreciation for the role of a free press in a democratic society is the Subcommittee's ultimate goal.

I am certain that your suggestions will be helpful to the Subcommittee as it undertakes this study of what I believe to be one of the critical constitutional dilemmas of our day.

With kindest wishes,

Sincerely yours,

SAM J. ERVIN, Jr.,
Chairman.

AUGUST 2, 1971.

Hon. SAM J. ERVIN, Jr.,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ERVIN: Dean Wayne Danielson, president of the Association for Education in Journalism, asked me to write directly to you about your study of freedom of the press. You wrote to him on July 20 soliciting comment on your plan for hearings.

I was in residence at the Brookings Institution, Washington, in 1965–66 when you and your staff studied Free Press and Fair Trial and had several contacts with Mr. Baskir and members of the committee staff. On the basis of this earlier observation, I feel that any study of freedom of the press you make is likely to be of considerable importance. For that reason, I set forth here some ideas that I hope will be useful. I must make clear that these ideas are personal and do not at this time represent the views of Dean Danielson or of the AEJ executive committee members.

RATIONALE

Your statement of purpose is thoughtfully considerate of the institutions of self government, as they deserve, and I hope in this letter to follow your excellent example.

The subject of press freedom is rendered unnecessarily tender, however, by the convention that the government really is out of bounds when it discusses the topic in a meaningful way. The convention seems to mean that although the government has a deep obligation to see that conditions favor freedom of the press, and therefore self-government, it may take little or no corrective action without the consent of the press. For its part, the press is such an amorphous institution that we can't really tell who speaks for it.

It is not as if nothing in the public interest needs to be done; instead, it is as if no matter what should be done, the government should not do it.

For this reason, it seems to me that your committee might properly consider, quite early, the kind of instrument it deems appropriate, in the circumstances, for carrying on work that clearly needs to be done. Should the instrument chosen be supported by public funds but placed legally beyond the control of any agency of government? If so, how can it also be protected from undue influence by private agencies and individuals? Should it be quasi-public? Or private? Should it cross the jurisdictional and interest lines of several committees or joint committees of the Congress?

And, in any case, as you observe, what should be its terms of reference? At the very least, given existing conditions, I think those terms should be broad and deep enough to enable the staff to get to the bottom of the major problems.

PROBLEM AREAS

What are the major problem areas? The following is my preliminary effort at describing them:

I

What are the physical dimensions of the tasks assigned by our society to the private and quasi-public agencies of mass communication? Are these agencies able, as presently organized and managed, to assemble and use the physical resources necessary to perform the minimum of services necessary for self-government? What problems of industrial and machine design, manpower supply, and distribution facilities block or impede realization of these minimum goals? What changes or improvements in physical resources and arrangements are necessary for realization of these minimum goals?

II

To what extent do the newsgathering agencies, the press associations and syndicates, the radio and television network news and special events departments, at home and abroad, meet the minimum goals of providing information for our self-governing community?

III

What are the goals and performance standards of the news and editorial personnel in the mass media? Are the conditions of collegiate instruction in journalism for print and broadcast media adequate for these standards? Do these conditions enable the media to recruit the needed minimum number of specialist and generalist employees?

IV

How does modern journalism arrive at its internal goals and standards? How are these goals articulated and propagated? Is there a sense of professional cohesion within journalism? If such professional cohesion exists, is it formal or informal? If informal, that is, unorganized, who are the "movers and shakers" in journalism and what is the internal process by which they communicate with the professional and quasi-professional news workers in the media? Would a press or communications council help meet the minimum needs of communication for self-government? If so, could such a council serve, in addition to its other duties, as an unofficial and impartial referee in disputes between government agencies and the press over matters of access to news of importance to self-government?

V

What are the barriers, inside and outside government, to the flow of information necessary to self-government? How can these barriers be modified or removed?

VI

Is the advertising industry an adequate physical support basis, or partial support basis, for the mass media at the present time and in the development of the news media, such as cable television and computers? If not, to what extent will supplementary support be necessary for the full development of present and news media and how can this support be made available?

Trusting that these suggestions will be found useful, I am,

Cordially yours,

J. EDWARD GERALD,

Old Senate Office Building, U.S. Capitol,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ERVIN: It has come to my attention that your Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Senate Judiciary Committee is investigating freedom of the press and government interference. Although I understand it is not the prime purpose of the investigation, it has been reported that some attention has been given to the application of the First Amendment to advertising.

If this should be a matter for consideration by the Subcommittee, I want to call your attention to the fact that outdoor advertising is one of the major media. The standardized industry which we represent, consisting of 500 individuals and companies operating in 10,000 markets, carries not only product, service and place advertising, but also carries political advertising of candidates and issues and editorial comment in the nature of public service messages relating to various subjects, such as drug abuse, charities, public health, religion, traffic safety and many others.

Outdoor advertising is also one of the most highly regulated media. It is subject not only to the general advertising content regulations of the F.T.C., but is regulated as to area of placement, size, spacing and lighting by the Highway Beautification Act of 1965 and state implementing laws. It is also regulated at the local level by zoning authorities and in some instances attempts have been made to totally ban the medium contrary to the First, Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

Although we recognize that freedom of the press does not prohibit all regulation and although we fully support reasonable regulation, we feel that in many instances our constitutional rights as one of the major media have been infringed upon.

If the Committee is to concern itself with these matters with respect to television, radio, newspapers and magazines, we do not want the government interference in our industry and the application of the First Amendment to be overlooked with respect to our medium.

Your consideration is greatly appreciated.

With highest esteem, I am

Respectfully,

HARRISON LEWIS

NEWSPAPER GUILD OF MADISON,
Madison, Wis., October 25, 1971.

Hon. SAM J. ERVIN,
Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SEN. ERVIN: I am responding to your letter of Sept. 22 regarding the constitutional and practical problems surrounding freedom of the press. I am taking the liberty of discussing the issue broadly, providing more than the specifics of the press card question which you mentioned.

At the outset I warn you of my prejudice. I believe that collective bargaining or collective action by concerned newsmen may solve many of the problems.

What then, you ask, are the press problems facing a middle-sized city in middle America? Those problems include press issuing credentials, authorities selectively recognizing those who carry equal credentials, authorities harassing reporters with threats if they do not turn over information, and publishers who accede to the whims of political figures.

Perhaps a greater issue is that of press freedom "for whom?" Newspaper economics tend to make press freedom a privilege for the very rich. How then does the average reporter or the poor man (which may be redundant) gain access to "freedom of the press?"

Let me explain how the Madison Newspaper Guild, a union of 50 members, is attempting to attack these problems.

The Columbia Journalism Review briefly mentioned our deliberate destruction of the police press cards. Allow me to background that incident. In the past the Madison police department had issued newsmen's "permits" signed by the chief. Our members complained to management, and they were able to convince the police to withdraw the word "permit" from the press cards.

However, the management of The Capital Times continued to provide its reporters with press cards signed by the chief of police. The student-police riots which engulfed this city periodically in the last four years produced civic uneasiness and changed press relations.

Many police did not allow reporters and photographers with authorized credentials signed by the chief to cross their lines. Young people on the other side were suspect of newsmen carrying credentials signed by the chief of police.

Life became particularly difficult for photographers because city and campus police turned to picture taking to attempt to improve their conviction rate. Riot reaction to persons carrying cameras became so difficult that in one instance Guild photographers as a body refused to go out and cover a riot. Management apparently agreed with the danger of the situation as no photographer was penalized.

This set the stage for Guild action on the press cards. The Guild, without dissent, voted to turn in their police press cards to me. As president I chopped them up in full view of management and dropped the remains on the city editor's desk.

Management responded with press cards signed only by company officials. They also carried the union "bug." The Guild was pleased but the union was prepared to authorize its own credentials signed by union officers if management had not acted.

Several of our reporters have faced threats of imprisonment from federal officials who were seeking information related to news stories. Let me relate their stories as they have relayed them to me.

The federal attorney for Western Wisconsin pointedly advised James Hougan of our union, on at least two occasions, that he would be jailed for obstructing a federal investigation if it were determined that he was withholding information about the 1970 bombing of a University of Wisconsin building. Hougan told U.S. Atty. John Olson that any information he had was contained in the printed news stories, adding that he would not "repeat gossip or data which could not be substantiated."

Hougan and David Wagner who also covered the story believed that the threat was a "thinly-veiled threat designed to force us into gathering information for authorities while acting in our roles as reporters."

They also report that following Olson's warning FBI agents came to the editorial offices to question them. They said the agents were polite but firm in their insistance that interviews be granted despite the reporters' pleas that they did not want to discuss the case with federal investigators since they believe "our news sources are our own." They told the FBI that their job was to inform the public, adding that that role would be compromised if they were forced to be "informers."

They spoke to the FBI agents and repeatedly declined to discuss such things as the personal habits of a local underground editor, that editor's news judgment or his friends. Hougan and Wagner felt that the FBI action was harassment and could tend to raise doubts in their superiors' minds about them.

That underground editor served 4½ months in jail for refusing to tell a grand jury investigating the bombing about the sources of a news story related to the bombing. He spent that time in jail for refusing to tell how he received a message from the so-called "New Year's Day Gang" which took credit for the bombing. That imprisonment came despite the fact that a federal grand jury had returned indictments against four young men for the bombing.

However, law enforcement officials are not the only ones working against the public's right to know and freedom of the press. Political figures and publishers work their own kind of "magic" in this area.

One of our reporters stumbled across a meeting between Gov. Patrick Lucey and members of the state's boards of regents. The reporter was asked by the governor's executive secretary to stay away from the meeting. Supported by his city editor, the reporter declined the request. Then the political aide asked the publisher to intervene and the reporter was ordered to stay away from the meeting.

As Guild president I registered a strong objection to the governor's aide. I told him that similar actions helped America sink into the Vietnam morass. He replied that he would do it again if he ever had the chance.

Later I was removed from coverage of the same issue—merger of the state's two collegiate systems—allegedly because of news stories which hurt the governor's position. The Guild is studying action in this case.

My greatest concern is not my situation but rather than of society. The Madison situation has shown that a publisher has unlimited power to determine what appears as news. He has the ultimate authority to determine even which "letters to the editors" get into the newspaper.

"Freedom of the press" is his alone. Congress can make no laws abridging this absolute freedom. Nor should it. The working men and women of the press, I believe, can do something about it. The journalism reviews which have sprouted are small ways to brake an uncontrolled engine riding the press freedom rails.

The Madison Guild is seeking another switch on this important road. In current negotiations we are seeking the right for any staff member to have an 800-word column printed UNCHANGED on the editorial page. We are willing to have it reviewed for libel and postal regulations. And we are willing to provide 72 hours notice for production problems.

What we are not ready to give up is the concept that the whim of a publisher can kill an idea because it is unpleasant to him.

Collective bargaining is perhaps the only way to achieve a brake on this whim. As you can imagine the publisher is having fits over the suggestion that he share freedom of the press with anyone.

Freedom of the press, after all, is the freedom to express varying ideas. Publishers privately and publicly brag that they are not frightened by Presidents or Senators. We think that they should not be afraid of ideas either.

MATTHEW A. POMMER,
President.
(For the Guild).

Chairman, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In response to your letter of September 16, 1971 requesting me to appear before your Subcommittee on September 29, 1971, I wish to advise you that, as a member of the immediate staff of the President, I must respectfully decline the invitation to testify.

WRAL–TV VIEWPOINT

AN EDITORIAL EXPRESSION OF THE VOICE OF FREE ENTERPRISE IN RALEIGH-DURHAM

(Jesse Helms, Executive Vice President and Vice Chairman of the Board)

A Senate subcommittee headed by North Carolina's senior U.S. Senator, Sam J. Ervin, Jr., is beginning a study of whether freedom of speech is being eroded in America. A letter of inquiry, bearing the Senator's signature, has been dispatched to several hundred representatives of the news media, and to other citizens as well. We suspect the Senator will receive plenty of mournful complaints that the First Amendment is indeed being abridged.

The Senator would be well advised to take most of such declarations with a grain of salt, or maybe a whole shaker full of it. It is not difficult to imagine, for example, that CBS will step forward, with a pious air of injured innocence, protesting that its rights were invaded by a Congressional inquiry disclosing the network's practice of distorting the news. And, of course, the whole leftwing crowd has been baying like hounds at Vice President Agnew because Mr. Agnew has refused to roll over and play dead for the major news media.

But if the Senator's committee wants to get its teeth into an obvious abridgement of the First Amendment, it ought to assign an investigator to look into a recent action taken by a federal judge down in Alabama.

Let's first circle the wagons, and get the background in perspective. For several years now, there has been a concerted campaign to ban all public renditions of the song, "Dixie." In school after school, in state after state, school authorities have yielded to demands that "Dixie" is never—never—to be played by school bands or sung by school choruses. Up to now, the melody had not been outlawed. But the federal judge in Alabama has made it against the law! Anybody who hums that old refrain about the land of cotton now risks being in a heap of trouble.

Funny thing about "Dixie." It was written by a Negro—and a resident of Ohio, at that—named Daniel Decatur Emmett. He wrote it for a minstrel show, and its original title was "Hurrah Song." It was one of President Lincoln's favorite tunes, and on April 10, 1865, Mr. Lincoln directed that it be played at a function at the White House.

In recent years, it has been claimed that "Dixie" is "racist," and that it is a symbol of the Confederacy and therefore a sort of advocacy of slavery. Those who make such assertions demonstrate their ignorance of history. The federal judge in Alabama fell into line with the ignorance. Of all people, he should be aware that the War Between the States was fought over tariffs and the right of secession—not slavery.

But, even so, where—under the First Amendment—did the judge find the power, and lawful power, to limit the free speech of those desiring to sing or play "Dixie" in public—at football games, in parades, etc.? He didn't find it; he manufactured it! Not only that, he also outlawed the display of the Confederate flag, and the use of "any other symbols, regalia or indicia of the Southern Confederacy" at any school function in Huntsville, Alabama!

We raise the question of free speech in this matter because Senator Ervin's subcommittee has raised it in general. It appears, frankly, that free speech yet survives only among a carefully selected and favored group. The federal courts have declared that mobs of hippies can desecrate the American flag as a part of their "freedom of speech." Demonstrators have been declared within the law—by federal judges—when they shout obscenities in public.

But in Huntsville, Alabama, the school band cannot play "Dixie," and nobody can wave a Confederate flag. It is a depressing delineation of freedom of speech. The cheer leaders in Huntsville don't have it, but the anti-American mobs in the streets do. Senator Ervin's subcommittee might well begin its investigation in the office of a federal judge who obviously misunderstands the intent of the First Amendment as badly as he does the history of the South—and the origin of "Dixie."

The News Business—WHERE AND WHAT IS "THE POWER OF THE PRESS"?

(By Richard Harwood)

Bernard Nossiter of our staff noted in a book review the other day that "the subject of power in American life . . . is essentially a mystery." He was talking about Rockefellers, duPonts, General Motors, etc.—the "power elite." He could have been more parochial about it, however, because the subject of power is one of the great mysteries in relation to our own business. Who runs the newspapers? For whom do we sing our songs at suppertime?

A popular theory (you even hear it in newsrooms) has it that newspapers are peculiarly vulnerable economic enterprises that are easily manipulated by the advertisers that keep them alive. On the face of it, this is not a bad theory.

Consider The Washington Post. This newspaper last year had revenues of about $77 million and profits of about $9 million. Only $13 million of the income came from our readers and that wasn't enough to pay the cost (more than $20 million) of the blank paper we consumed. It was the advertisers who kept us alive and prosperous; they spent $64 million for space in The Washington Post last year. Without their dollars we could not survive in our present form and that is true of every daily newspaper in America. Thus, if your mind works in a certain way, it is easy to arrive at the following ipso facto: advertisers have the ultimate power of the purse; either we dance to their tune or they cut off our bread and wine. They have made us, one scholar has said, "the cultural arm of American industry."

Statements of that sort evoke a specific vision of Big Oil, Big Steel, Big Autos and Big Banks using their advertising millions to shape news and editorial policies, to "turn the status quo into social law," (as another press critic has put it). Venality of this kind has occurred often enough in the history of American journalism to lend credibility to the view. It may still occur in the case of financially shaky newspapers. But as a general theory of newspaper control, it won't do.

The reason is that newspapers in the last quarter century or so have become very muscular economic units. Collectively, they are now rated the 10th largest industry in the country (in the value of shipments). Increasingly they have evolved into conglomerate corporations, buying up radio and television properties, magazines, paper companies, book publishing houses, and related businesses. And increasingly they have achieved, after fierce competitive struggles, monopolistic or near-monopolistic publishing positions in their home communities. Effective newspaper competition exists today in only 4 per cent of our large cities. Only New York, Boston and Washington have more than two newspaper ownerships.

The elimination of diverse newspaper voices may have been an unhealthy social and political development. It may have been an unhealthy economic development simply because monopolies have always been anathema in America. But it has also enabled newspapers to broaden their circulation and advertising bases to the point that they are now virtually immune to advertiser pressures or controls. No single company and no single industry now dominates newspaper advertising. The biggest corporation in the country—General Motors—spent $29.4 million on newspaper advertising last year and that represented less than half of one-percent of newspaper advertising revenues.

The major source of newspaper revenues today is thousands of local advertisers—merchants, in the main—none of whose exenditures are crucial to survival. Of the 2,500 retailers who advertise in The Washington Post, only about 20 spend as much as $100,000 a year; the largest spends $3 million.

Business Week magazine last year examined the economic structure of the newspaper industry and concluded that it would continue to draw advertisers like flies, despite television, "because newspapers . . . are the next best thing to an indispensable medium . . . Besides important local and national happenings, newspapers dish up everything from hometown job, apartment, housing, movie, theater, stock market and television listings to details on yesterday's garden club luncheon, last night's PTA meeting, and tonight's YMCA squash match, along with A&P's latest prices on sirloin and the department store's close-out bargains on minis." They win their audiences (and hence their advertisers), Business Week suggested, by selling a daily smorgasbord of information and entertainment.

Consider, again, The Washington Post. As a fully autonomous corporation it presumably could change its character overnight. For good or ill, it could eliminate its sports section, the comic strips, the amusement and feature pages, for instance, and then easily double the space devoted to "serious" affairs of state. But whether, under those circumstances, it could retain its present audience (and advertisers) is doubtful enough that no one has even been tempted to try it. (When Prince Valiant was dropped from the comics section for space reasons last Sunday the uproar from readers was such that the Prince has been declared untouchable on future Sundays).

This means that the audience exerts a very direct and palpable measure of "control" over a newspaper, in the sense that it limits our options and shapes the character and content of our product. It does not mean that every time Reader X or 100 Reader Xs disapprove of something in the paper the product is changed to meet those objections. But if 50,000 or 100,000 readers were to opt out as subscribers someone—to put it very mildly—would ask: "What are we doing wrong? How de we get them back?"

This business of audience "control" goes beyond the matter of sports pages and comic strips. It affects, also, our treatment of the news. In those forgotten times when there was a multiplicity of dailies in the large cities, it was common for newspapers to pander to particular audiences. They functioned, very often, as organs of political parties, factions or ideologies in much the way that journals like Human Events (rightwing) or the Quicksilver Times (Maoist left) do today. The rise of monopolistic newspapers in search of very large and very diverse audiences changed all that. For both practical and public service-minded reasons, newspapers began regarding themselves as having at least some aspects of a public utility and thus assumed a new responsibility to be "professional" and "fair" in their presentation of the news. A major factor in that evolution was the recognition that propaganda is very difficult to sell to a mass audience marked by political and ideological diversity.

So newspapers have become less partisan and more professional and, overall, highly profitable economic enterprises. And this success, itself, has affected the traditional power and control mechanisms by which they were run. In leaner times they resembled cottage industries in their internal structure. They tended to be projections of the personalities of forceful owners or editors. But today a large newspaper is a large corporation with all the bureaucracy and diffused authority that are characteristic of such institutions. Last year, someone asked an editor of The Post to tell him who ran the place and the editor replied: "if you find out, please let me know." His answer was not entirely facetious, one suspects, because The Washington Post is a house of many mansions, each of which is "run" by different people operating under different constraints. There are, of course, super-powers within the corporation, notably the owner Katharine Graham and her chief deputies. But if "running" a newspaper means deciding what goes in and what stays out, then The Washington Post is "run" by a host of people—reporters as well as editors—who bring to their work different standards, different interests and different points of view. Tthey are all cogs in the "control" and "power" mechanisms. They all shape its character and content within the broad constraints imposed by the diversity of the audience.

EDITORS FACE THREAT TO PRESS FREEDOM

(By James Reston of The New York Times)

WASHINGTON.—The American Society of Newspaper Editors is in Washington again for its annual skull practice, and this year, it has some serious questions to discuss, for all news reporters and editors—radio and television even more than newspaper—are under mounting pressure from all branches of the government and from the public as well.

In the last year, the Defense Department has gone beyond the normal regulations on battlefield reporting to censor the news on the war in Laos and limit access to the primary areas of combat. Also, as the editors' freedom of information committee charged in its annual report: "Never has the subpoena been used as viciously, as irresponsibly and as often against freedom of the press as it has this (past) year."

Reporters and editors in radio and television have had even more difficult problems, for while the newspapers usually have the protection of the freedom of the press amendment to the Constitution in the courts, the networks and their affiliated stations are licensed by a government which has the power to impose its notion of "fair reporting" by threatening to withdraw a station's license.

The threats, of course, are always oblique. Thus in recent weeks, Vice President Agnew has not only been running a campaign against the Columbia Broadcasting System's program on the Defense Department's propaganda apparatus ("The Selling of the Pentagon") and demanding the right to edit his own copy on the subject over the CBS network, but the investigations subcommittee of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has subpoenaed CBS to produce all its notes and unused film and disbursements of money on the Pentagon program.

These are issues—the radio and television as well as the newspaper subpoenas—that deserve more attention from the newspaper editors than they have been getting. Newspaper editors howl like a scalded dog whenever any government official asks to see their reporters' notes or questions their news judgment—and quite right too—but they are comparatively quiet when the vice president or committees of the Congress demand the same thing of the radio and television reporters.

This double standard could use a little more examination from the newspaper editors here this week. The basic assumption of the First Amendment was that the people in a democratic society had a better chance to get a fair presentation of the news from a multitude of free reporters than from reporters regulated by the government.

The founding fathers had no illusions about the infallibility of the press. Their comments about our stupidity, inaccuracy, and bias make Spiro Agnew's sound almost genial. But they were persuaded that the risks of freedom were less than the risks of legal strictures or government control, and it is hard to argue that this protection for the newspaper reporters should not now be guaranteed to the radio and television stations, which now supply a majority of the American people with their first reports of the news.

There is, of course, nothing wrong with the vice president complaining publicly about bias in the press and the radio and television. As he is constantly pointing out, he has his freedom of speech too, and since major newspapers select about 100,000 words a day out of almost two million, it would be remarkable if there was not an argument about whether the selection and front-page presentation were "fair."

The difference is that newspaper editors can tell the complaining vice president or the members of the House Investigations Committee to go climb the Washington Monument and the radio and TV editors are not quite so free. They are under government license. They use "the people's airwaves" (as if the newspapers didn't use the people's streets and interstate highways), and they operate under different rules.

They must submit to an official "fairness doctrine," which is a government and not a professional journalist's standard. It is enforced, or at least under threat of being enforced, by a government licensing agency. The radio and TV people must answer when the Federal Communications Commission inquiries are made, and truth is not necessarily a defense.

It is ironic that the FCC's "fairness doctrine" was intended to assure precisely that, but everything depends on who is deciding what is "fair," and the guess here is that the founding fathers would still bet on Walter Cronkite rather than on Agnew.

Nevertheless, the public reaction to all this is clearly divided. The people have heard all the arguments between government and press, and it is fairly obvious that their confidence is not unbounded in either institution.

Part of this is due to the fact that the newspaper, radio and television editors have not been very good at self-criticism, or in establishing an effective "fairness doctrine" of their own, which is why there is so much public criticism of reporting, and why there is now so much talk of establishing some kind of local and national news council machinery to review the record of the papers and stations.

No doubt there will be much discussion of these issues in Washington this week, particularly the newspaper side of the question, but the immediate threat of government pressure and influence is on radio and television, and if their freedom is impaired, even the freedom of the printed press is not likely to be unaffected.

Seventh Class Postal Service

(by Marquis Childs)

The theory was that a postal service divorced from the patronage control of Congress would be able to move a letter between two principal cities in, say, a day and a half instead of two to three days. Efficiency, economy—that was the pitch of former Postmaster General Winton M. Blount, a supersalesman who argued that it was time to junk the old mess for a business operation.

Today, nearly two years after the divorce, the turgid mass of the mail moves at the same glacial pace. Nothing so directly touches millions of Americans as the delay and uncertainty in the delivery of the mails. It is everybody's business and yet almost nobody seems able to do anything about it, if only because the process has the same impenetrable bureaucratic look as it had when Congress was calling the shots.

Elmer Cerin, a Washington lawyer who has made himself a postal expert, did a careful study last year on first-class mail delivery. He concluded that a program heralded as making better use of manpower and equipment had resulted in increasing mail handling time by 29 per cent for outgoing letter mail originating and destined for the nation's 10 principal post offices. The Cerin study was put in the congressional record by Sen. Gale McGee (D-Wyo) chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, with the threat that the post office reorganization act would be greatly modified or even repealed if things did not look up.

A fair-minded man, Cerin says there has been a slight improvement since he did his duty. But it is almost imperceptible as the P.S. faces the same frozen structure of union rigidity, rapid turnover of personnel and outmoded techniques as under the old system.

The choice is between stepping up efficiency and raising rates in the hope that more money will turn the trick. A business operation, the service was to pay its own way and Congress surrendered control over the mail rates.

In May the first-class letter rate went from six cents to eight cents. The airmail rate is soon to jump from 11 to 13 cents. Business and banks, the principal users of first-class mail, will simply pass it on to the consumer, which means another upward notch in the inflationary spiral.

The power of the P.S. over rates cuts a wide swath. It threatens to put in further jeopardy the printed word that is now hard pressed under the impact of television. Nothing could illustrate this better than the way the Nixon China expedition is tailored for the cameras with the new technology of the satellite.

Under the old system Congress provided a subsidy for second-class mail covering magazines and newspapers. This was in the belief, advanced in the early days of the republic, in the educational value of the printed word. With that subsidy wiped out the Postal Service is proposing a 142 per cent increase in second-class rates.

In testimony the other day before Sen. Sam Ervin's Subcommittee on Freedom of Information, Andrew Heiskell, chairman of the board of Time, Inc., said the increase would raise the mailing costs of Time's four magazines by $27 million over a five-year period.

And he set this against profits before taxes of the four publications. According to Heiskell, it is even worse, with pretax earnings of $50 million under the gun of a rate increase of $130 million by 1976.

The concept of the subsidy as underwriting education has been stretched a long way, with publications pandering to sensationalism and others that offer thinly disguised political propaganda.

Yet the demise of the printed word is a fact of the television era. Collier's, The Saturday Evening Post, and Look have gone. And Life suffers heavy losses. Metropolitan dailies benefited little, if at all, from the subsidy, since distribution was largely by truck. But weeklies, the specialized periodicals of nationwide organizations and a host of other printed media will feel the heavy hand of the rate increase.

Setting up published service standards late last year, the P.S. promised one-day delivery within a 600-mile radius for first-class mail and a 95 per cent improvement in delivery of air mail. The way is open for infinite improvement.

[From the New York Times, "Arts and Leisure" section, Oct. 11, 1970]

DEAR VICE PRESIDENT AGNEW . . .

Do we live in a "drug culture" largely promoted and spread by rock music via the communications media? Vice President Agnew, in a speech in Las Vegas recently, cited part of a Beatles' song ("I get high with a little help from my friends") as but one example of how American youths are being "brainwashed" into drug use. Nicholas Johnson, a member of the Federal Communications Commission, replied to Mr. Agnew's charge several days later at a symposium of the United States Information Agency in Washington, D.C. His address follows.

(By NICHOLAS JOHNSON, FCC Commissioner)

Earlier this week Vice President Agnew revealed that even he has been listening to rock music. I don't think this should be cause for panic—even though he does. I think it holds out some promise. The Administration may just find out what's happening in the country.

Mr. Agnew now seems to think that music is the cause of (rather than the relief from) the pressures that lead people to use hard drugs. Perhaps we can understand and excuse this rather fundamental error as he came down from his first trip, but I think we can fairly hold him to a higher standard in the future.

The Vice President has asked us to "Consider . . . the influence of the drug culture in the field of music. . . . [In] too many of the lyrics the message of the drug culture is purveyed." That's where he makes his mistake. No song writer I know of is urging as a utopia a society in which the junkie's life is a rational option. Most would agree with his suggestion that dependence on hard drugs is "a depressing lifestyle of conformity that has neither life nor style."

Listen to the music:

Your mind might think it's flying
On those little pills
But you ought to know it's dying
Because . . . Speed kills!

That's Canned Heat in "Amphetamine Annie." Here's Steppenwolf, singing about "The Pusher":

You know I've seen a lot of people walkin' around
With tombstones in their eyes
But the pusher don't care
If you live or if you die
If I were the President of this land
I'd declare total war on the Pusher Man
God Damn the Pusher.

Or listen to the Rolling Stones' "Mother's Little Helper," because they're really trying to help you understand what your generation's problem is, as well as giving the kids some good advice:

Mother needs something today to calm her down
And though she's not really ill
There's a little yellow pill
She goes running for the shelter
Of her "Mother's Little Helper"
And it helps her on her way
Gets her through her busy day

And if you take more of those
You will get an overdose
No more running for the shelter
Of a "Mother's Little Helper"
They just help you on your way
Through your busy dying day.

There is comparable advice in Love's "Signed, D. C.," "Crystal Blues" by Country Joe and the Fish, and The Who's "Tommy."

No, the real issue, Mr. Vice President, is not the desirability of hard drugs. The issue is whether you, and the rest of the Administration, are—to borrow Eldridge Cleaver's (and VISTA's) phrase—part of the solution, or part of the problem. The question is whether you have done anything to alter the repressive, absurd and unjust forces in our society that drive people to drugs. Since you've suggested that "we should listen more carefully to popular music," and quoted from "With a Little Help From My Friends," I'd like to lay a few more lyrics on you.

Listen to Steppenwolf's "Monster," written by Jerry Edmonton, John Day and Nick St. Nicholas (no relation):

Once the religious, the haunted and weary
Chasing the promise of freedom and hope
Came to this country to build a new vision
Far from the reaches of kingdom and pope
The spirit it was freedom and justice
Its keepers seemed generous and kind
Its leaders were supposed to serve the country
But now they don't pay it no mind
'Cause the people grew fat and got lazy
And now their vote is a meaningless joke
They babble about law and order
But it's all just an echo they've been told
The cities have turned into jungles
And corruption is strangling the land
The police force is watching the people
And the people just can't understand.

Or Hal David and Burt Bacharach's "Paper Mache" for Dionne Warwick:

Twenty houses in a row
Eighty people watch a TV show
Paper people, cardboard dreams
How unreal the whole thing seems.

Can we be living in a world made of paper mache?
Ev'rything is clean and so neat
Anything that's wrong can be just swept away
Spray it with cologne and the whole world smells sweet

There's a sale on happiness
You buy two and it costs less.

Here's some musical commentary about what the major campaign contributors (Democrats and Republicans alike) have done to America—Joni Mitchell's "Big Yellow Taxi":

They took all the trees
And put them in a tree museum
And they charged all the people
A dollar and a half just to see 'em
Don't it always seem to go
That you don't know what you've got Until it's gone
They paved paradise
And put up a parking lot.

I can understand why some wouldn't like lyrics like those.

You see, Mr. Vice President, somebody's trying to tell you something—"And you don't know what it is . . . do you, Mr. Jones?" (To quote Bob Dylan.) These music people aren't really urging death through drugs; they are urging life through democracy. They believe that governments are instituted among men to promote "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." And many don't think yours is doing it.

As the Chairman of the Bank of America, Louis Lundborg, said recently, "What [young people] . . . say they want doesn't sound so different, you know, from what our Founding Fathers said they wanted—the men who wrote our Declaration of Independence, our Mayflower Compact, the Bill of Rights, the other early documents that laid the foundation for the American Dream. They said they wanted the freedom to be their own man, the freedom for self-realization. We have lost sight of that a bit in this century—but the young people are prodding us and saying, "Look, Dad—this is what it's all about."

But this is not all. It's not just that corporate, governmental and other institutions have turned away from our original goals, and that they have created conditions that stimulate the desire to escape. They are actually encouraging the drug life and profiting from it. Senator Frank Moss has observed that: "The drug culture finds its fullest flowering in the portrait of American society which can be pieced together out of the hundreds of thousands of advertisements and commercials. It is advertising which amounts so graphically the message that pills turn rain to sunshine, gloom to joy, depression to euphoria, solve problems and dispel doubt."

And the former Chairman of the Administration's Federal Trade Commission, Caspar W. Weinberger, has noted that, "Advertisements for over-the-counter medicines may be a contributing factor in drug abuse problems in the United States." (TV ran about $20 million worth of ads for sleeping aids alone in 1969.)

Our entire consumer-manipulating economy is based on a dishonest, destructive exploitation of human emotions and motivations. Television teaches—with continuous, air-hammer effectiveness—the dangerous and debilitative lie that the solution to all life's problems and nagging anxieties can be found in a product, preferably one that is applied to the skin or taken into the body. It has so distorted and demeaned the role of women as to make it almost impossible for either men or women to relate to each other in other than a sex-object, manipulative way. It has educated our children to go for the quick solution, to grow impatient and disinterested in developing skills and solutions requiring discipline and training. And it has urged us all to seek "better living through chemistry."

The Vice President is going after the song writers. One cannot help but wonder how he overlooked Ford's urging, "blow your mind," TWA's taking us "up, up and away," the honey company that suggests we "get high on honey," the motor bike company that advertises "a trip on this one is legal," or the Washington, D.C., television station that promotes its programing as great "turn-on's." Perhaps the critical point is that young song writers and performers don't make political campaign contributions, but that Ford, TWA, and other drug-image merchandisers do.

The Vice President might better turn his attention to the corporate campaign contributors (of both parties) who finance their fat campaign donations with the profits they make from worthless or harmful drugs, and from cigarettes and alcohol that first "addict" and then kill hundreds of thousands of Americans a year.

The Vice President has urged each of us to do our own part to "set an example" within our own families. How about the "political families" of the major political parties? To what extent is the Vice President's own party prepared to refuse to accept contributions from (or do special favors for) those politically influential corporate interests that feed, and feed upon, the artificially-induced thirst for drugs, pep pills, tranquilizers, alcohol, cigarettes, and other contemporary commercial "panaceas"?

The Vice President has pointed with pride to what the Administration has done to crack down on "drugs." But what has it done to deal with our number one drug problem, alcoholism? It is, perhaps, symbolic of the basic hypocrisy in government today that he chose Las Vegas as the battlefield to attack drugs. For the only thing that flows faster than the gamblers' money in Las Vegas is alcohol. There are estimated to be at least five million alcoholics in this country. There are more alcoholics in San Francisco alone than there are narcotics addicts in the entire country. If you're interested in "law and order," one-third to one-half of all arrests by police in the United States are for chronic drunkenness. More Americans are killed by drunk drivers every year than are killed by murderers and the war in Southeast Asia combined. And, of course, the economic loss through absenteeism, the physical damage to the body (cirrhosis is the sixth leading cause of death; psychosis due to alcoholic brain damage is irreversible), and the impact upon family and friends, are far more severe from alcoholism than from all other hard drugs combined.

Or how about nicotine addiction? There are 300,000 deaths a year related to cigarette smoking. What is the Vice President doing to cut down on these pushers? One recent survey found that of seventh graders, only 30 per cent of the boys and 40 per cent of the girls had never tried tobacco. There are a lot more kids who are being exposed to drugs because of the deliberate efforts of greedy, immoral television and tobacco company executives to hook 'em on nicotine—executives who are revered as the pillars of our society, and whose activities are sanctioned by the Federal Government—than there are those who get pot "with a little help from their friends."

So who's kidding whom? If we're really serious about doing something to alter the drug culture in America's let's get on with the work and stop worrying about the music. Let's not indulge the hypocrisy of going after the drug users who are poor, black and young with a vengeance, as if they were criminals, without even providing them adequate treatment centers, and ignore the far more serious problem of the hard-drug pushers (of alcohol and cigarettes) who are respectable, rich and middle-aged. Let's stop accepting the campaign contributions of the "respectable" liquor manufacturers with one hand while we're imprisoning some of our finest young people with the other.

Above all, let us stop going for help to advertising executives who sit around, after their three-martini lunches, coming up with ad campaigns that preach the get-away-from-it-all qualities of caffeine, nicotine, aspirin and other pain killers, alcohol, stomach settlers, pep pills, tranquilizers and sleeping pills (plus the whole range of mouthwash, deodorant, cosmetics, etc.). How, in the midst of the chemical life they're glamorized, can they absolve their consciences by telling our kids that a 16th or 17th chemical will bring the downfall of their lives and the Republic? They can run it up your flagpole, Mr. Vice President, but nobody's going to salute it.

The forces of censorship are subtle. This Administration repeats and repeats that it is not censoring—just as the Russians did when they rolled their tanks into Czechoslovakia in August, 1968. But when the Vice President starts criticizing television, pretty soon the "analysis" of the President's speeches is watered down or disappears, and President Nixon builds up a record of (free) prime time television usage that exceeds every other prior President. The President shows up on a Bob Hope special; the Vice President opens the Red Skelton show. Now they are moving in on radio. FCC Chairman Burch says he's interested in "obscenity" in lyrics; the Vice President is concerned about mentions of drugs. That's the way you do it. You don't come right out and say, "Cut the controversial stuff, guys. We don't like the people getting that social criticism set to music." Of course not. You talk about obscenity and drugs. But the radio station owners get the message: the Administration's listening to them, just like it's watching their big, wealthy brothers, the TV stations.

If we really want to do something about drugs, let's do something about life. Because if we make an effort to strike at the real causes of addiction to alcohol and other less prevalent and dangerous drugs, we will find that we have also made a big dent in mental illness, divorce and suicide rates, and the other statistical indicia of social disintegration. Let's get on with the job of giving people the physical, mental and spiritual environment they need in order to grow closer to their full potential. That means more money (not vetoes of appropriations) for rebuilding our cities, education, food programs, urban transportation, welfare, job training, and health care. It means more meaningful job opportunity for all Americans—white and black; a meaningful attack on the problems of underemployment and meaningless employment as well as unemployment. It means appropriations for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, for parks, libraries, and beautification programs.

The song writers are trying to help us understand our plight and deal with it. It's about the only leadership we're getting. They're not really urging you adopt a heroin distribution program, Mr. Vice President. In fact they don't think that you can "spray it with cologne and the whole world smells sweet" either. It stinks. They want us to help them clean it up.

The song you quoted, "With a Little Help From My Friends," is not a joyful pitch for drugs. It contains the lines,

Do you need anybody
I need somebody to love,
Could it be anybody
I want somebody to love.

How many Americans seek in drugs the solace from a vicious cruel world they did not create, but cannot escape? What are you doing to change that world?

Some song writers are hopeful. Mama Cass sings,

Yes a new world's coming
The one we've had visions of
And it's growing stronger with each day that passes by Coming in peace, coming in joy, coming in love.

She's holding out optimism. She's giving you a little more time, Mr. Vice President. But we can't wait much longer if history is not to record our presiding over the decline and fall of the American empire—complete with words, music, and a drug culture sold to the American people by large contributors to Presidential campaigns.

THE SLOAN REPORT: VIEWING CABLE TV

(By Alan M. Kriesgman)

Cable television could bring as many as 40 separate channels into more than half of American homes by the end of the decade, a long-awaited report predicted yesterday.

The Sloan Commission on Cable Communications, which issued the report, holds that rapid development of cable systems is in the public interest. The report envisions a "television of abundance"with in the next 10 years, offering the public a broad range of programs and services.

The fulfillment of these predictions, the study states, will depend upon the ability of cable to gain access to programming upon payment of copyright fees. Given this access, the commission deems that no restrictions upon the importation of "distant signals" would be necessary.

The copyright and distant signal issues have long been a course of dispute between cable interests and established television broadcasters, who have tended to regard cable TV as an economic threat.

The Sloan report, however, maintains that the public interest would best be served by permitting cable and broadcast television to compete on equal footing. The broadcast industry has "no greater right than other industries" to protection from the encroachments of technological innovation, the report asserts.

If its recommendations are followed, the commission foresees a nationwide cable hookup that would carry mass entertainment—some picked up "off-the-air" from existing television, some provided by cable operators and persons leasing cable channels; most of this programming would be supported by advertising.

The cable systems also would carry specialized entertainment programs, supported by subscription or advertising or both. They also would transmit news and opinion, supported by subscription and advertising and would have channels set aside for governmental, community, education and commercial services. Public access channels and two-way capability would be built into the framework.

The report differs in several ways from the recent "compromise" formula issued by the President's Office of Telecommunications Policy and approved by the Federal Communication Commission, the cable industry, broadcasters and the film companies that hold most television copyrights.

The Sloan Commission and the OTP plan agree on the desirability of cable industry growth. But they take different views on how this should be achieved.

The Sloan report is more liberal towards cable operators in the matter of distant signals. The effect of the OTP plan, which Congress is expected to consider early next year, would be to allow the cable industry to expand the cable within the bottom half of the 100 largest markets across the country. But cable growth would be restricted within the top 50 markets, where two-thirds of the national television audience resides. The Sloan report would permit immediate expansion in all 100 markets, with relatively minor restrictions.

These differences reflect divergent attitudes toward the possible threat cable may pose to the broadcasting industry.

According to the Sloan report, the FCC, and by implication the OTP as well, has tended to favor the broadcasters. The Sloan Commission, asserting that the interest of the viewing public in diversity of programming is paramount, recommends no special protective measures for existing broadcasting systems.

"We have sought to maximize the service to the public that can be provided by television as a whole," the report states. "If, in that process of maximization, the existing structure of over-the-air television is undermined, we believe that the public interest must still remain paramount.

"We do not believe that in the short term the structure of over-the-air television is seriously undermined; we believe further that in the long term over-the-air television can adjust to the developing new situation.

"But in any case, if over-the-air television is to fall victim, in some degree or another, to technological change, it is in no different position from any other enterprise in which investments have been made, and possesses no greater right than other industries to protection from technological change."

The 256-page Sloan report is the work of a 16-member panel of economists, educators, scientists, lawyers and other public figures, appointed by the Alfred J. Sloan Foundation in June of 1970 to undertake a study of the promise and proplems of cable television.

The commission was headed by Edward S. Mason, chairman dean emeritus of the Harvard University Graduate School of Public Administration.

Among the members were Kermit Gordon, president of the Brookings Institution; Carl Kaysen, director of the Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton. N.J.; Jerome B. Weisner, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; James Q. Wilson, Harvard University professor of government; Franklin A. Thomas, president of the Bedford-Stuyvesant Restoration Corp. Patricia M. Wald, attorney with the Center for Law and Social Policy in Washington, and Ivan Allen Jr., former mayor of Atlanta.

Among the major specific recommendations of the report are the following:

Resolution of the copyright issue by Congress, which is advised to make bidding on copyrighted material equally available to cable companies and broadcasters.

Setting of minimum standards for allocation of channels, technical requirements, public access, and franchise and ownership conditions by Congress or the FCC.

Establishment by Congress of a federal program to encourage the exploitation of cable's potentialities.

Prohibition of ownership of cable franchises by networks.

Limiting the number of cable subscribers served nationally by any single individual or corporation owning a cable franchise.

Preference, in granting franchise ownership, to "community non-profit and profit-making institutions within neighborhoods which have special social or ethnic problems and needs."

Waiver of the Fairness Doctrine in the case of public access channels.

Limitation of cable franchises to 10 years, during the present decade.

The Commission also recommends "legislation that would reserve specified playoff and championship sports events for conventional television, and would free other sporting events for competitive bidding between pay television and sponsor-supported television."

The report concludes, "We have tried to establish the prerequisites for a television of abundance and to suggest some of the services that such a television system might provide, including those beyond an enriched provision of entertainment and news. An impressive new instrument of communication has been made available to society by the advance of technology. It remains for society to employ that instrument wisely and well."

The report, entitled "On the Cable: The Television of Abundance," has been published in paperback format by McGraw-Hill and will be available at $2.95 per copy.

Members of the Sloan Commission and other experts in the cable field will be participants in a television show, "The Cable TV Revolution—the Promise of Abundance," to be seen locally on WETA-TV (Channel 26) at 11 p.m. Sunday evening (part I) and 11 p.m. next Tuesday (part II).

THE "UNDERGROUND" PRESS: AN OLD TRADITION

Time was in America when newspapers abounded everywhere. They were not. for the most part, mass circulation newspapers; they did not need mass circulations to survive. They were perhaps, more ideological than commercial, reflecting an almost endless variety of political and social points of view. Conceived by men who had something they wanted to say, they were born easily and died easily. It didn't take much capital in the early days of the Republic to become a publisher; a simple flat-bed printing press and an ability to set type were about all that was required. Indeed, the economic context in which the free press clause of the First Amendment was framed presumed a diversity of editorial opinions, challenging and counteracting each other.

Newspaper publishing in any major city is now a big business enterprise, and competition has become the exception rather than the rule. The established press tends, therefore, to reflect, in greater or lesser degree, an establishment view of contemporary life. And that view is doubtless easily and less effectively challenged than it ought to be. Challenges of a sort have been coming of late, however, from the so-called "underground" press. The term is applied to newspapers produced somewhat irregularly, usually on a rather inadequate financial foundation, odd in format, irreverent in outlook, self-consciously shocking in style and opposed to almost everything established.

Faithful readers of The Washington Post (praised be their name) may not find the Washington Free Press or the Quicksilver Times or any of the many underground papers currently circulated among GIs—about which Washington Post Staff Writer Sanford J. Ungar reported the other day—entirely to their liking. These publications tend to tell more than the average reader wants to know about how to make a Molotov cocktail or how to blow up a bank or how to find a partner for one's pad. And they occasionally deviate, in some slight measure, it must be said, from established standards of good taste.

Nevertheless, the underground papers fulfill an important function—and a function which the First Amendment was contrived to protect. They assail orthodoxy, puncture pomposity, rail at those in power. The risks inherent in having this function discharged captiously, unfairly, extravagantly and tastelessly—from an orthodox point of view—are far less than the risks inherent in letting such criticism be silenced by official censorship. This, at least, is the theory of the First Amendment, and it is a theory that has so far worked very well for the American people.

[From the Press, Freedoms Under Pressure, 20th Century Fund, N.Y., 1972]

"Where men cannot freely convey their thoughts to one another, no other liberty is secure; the way is barred for making common cause against encroachments . . . Free expression is thus unique among liberties as protector and promoter of the others . . . The meaning of a free press is inseparable from the general meaning of freedom in the modern state."

—William Ernest Hocking

"The First Amendment presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues than through any kind of authoritative selection. To many this is, and will always be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all."

—Learned Hand

INTRODUCTION

Farsighted though they were, James Madison, John Adams and Thomas Jefferson, who led the battle for adoption of the Bill of Rights, could not possibly have envisioned what the years ahead were to hold for the nation they were founding. Theirs was a country of just over three million people and an inhospitable wilderness. There were just 32 newspapers in all of the country; total circulation, at most, was 40,000 a week. To the nation's founders, journalism was as much Tom Paine's Common Sense and the "Crisis" papers as newspapers struggling to exist. The passage of the Stamp Act that placed a tax on papers and the drama of John Peter Zenger's trial that centered on freedom of the press were still fresh.

It was not possible, those 200 years ago, to foresee a nation of more than 200 million people, of 1,750 daily newspapers with 65 million copies each day rolling from their presses, of magazines of infinite variety numbering more than 200 million copies each month, and of ubiquitous radio and television. Even Jefferson, that Renaissance man of his time, would not have speculated about electronic communication, much less one that reaches almost every home with the power to bring sight and sound from American explorers on the moon.

Yet it is reasonable to believe that were they with us today, Jefferson and his colleagues would acknowledge and accept radio and television as integral arms of the press. For the founders of the Republic felt themselves to be inheritors of a great tradition. They were acutely aware that the intellectual revolution launched in the middle of the fifteenth century by Johann Gutenberg had been persistently opposed by governments; that the curbing of public communications had been so extensive that for 200 years printing in Europe could be likened to Rousseau's mankind, "born free, but everywhere in chains." In making their own revolution, they felt themselves moving in the spirit of John Milton's Areopagitica:

> Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties. . . . Though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously, by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple; whoever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter.

Areopagitica had been the core of the Zenger defense in 1735. Benjamin Franklin was one of many colonists to support the immigrant printer, whose New York Weekly Journal had fulminated against William Cosby, the profligate royal governor. Franklin had helped persuade Andrew Hamilton to plead Zenger's cause. Hamilton's defense was Miltonian, declaring that "the words themselves must be libelous—that is, false, scandalous and seditious, or we are not guilty." Hamilton claimed "a right—the liberty—both of exposing and opposing arbitrary power by speaking and writing truth." The verdict upholding Zenger became part of the tradition which was to make the Constitution as originally drafted unacceptable without the Bill of Rights.

The First Amendment was all encompassing:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof: or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press . . .

The founders recognized journalism as a restless, cantankerous force. At the time, the nation's fledgling press was tendentious, wildly partisan and, all too often, wilfully and grossly inaccurate. Although Jefferson once wrote "Nothing can now be believed which is seen in a newspaper," he never recanted another statement upholding the right of a free press. As he put it:

> The basis of our government being the opinion of the people, the very first object should be to keep that right; and were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without government, I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter. But I mean that every man should receive these papers, and be capable of reading them.

Many in the young Republic did not agree with Jefferson. Some refused to tolerate the waywardness of editors. When George Washington was vilified in the press, notably by Franklin's grandson in the Philadelphia Aurora, it was wrecked by an angry mob. The ill-advised and hastily passed Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798 were turned against editors and many were charged with "writing and printing false, scandalous and malicious" statements against the government and the congress. Jefferson, after taking office as President, stopped further prosecutions.

Yet through much of the nation's history, the press has continued to be a troublesome presence. Frequently, the press has been irresponsible; always it has been a constant and visible target. Newspapers were wrecked by mobs on both sides of the slavery-abolitionist battle preceding the Civil War; one such mob martyred the Illinois abolitionist editor, Elijah P. Lovejoy. During the Civil War, generals like Burnside and Dix used their powers to suppress newspapers in Chicago and New York. In World War I and after, superpatriots sought to punish editors of whom they disapproved through the Espionage Act of 1917. Later, there were other and different attacks. In the 1930s, Huey Long of Louisiana, for instance, induced a compliant legislature to place a tax on advertising: it was struck down by the courts as "a deliberate and calculated device to limit the circulation of information." During the 1940s, some judges in Southern and Western states sought to impose contempt citations on editors who insisted on appraising the operations of their courts. And throughout our history, the chief executive and other government officials have found reason to deplore, scold or denounce one or another segment of the press, including the minority press.

This continuity of conflict makes clear that friction is inevitable between a free press and government, and that it is most strained when the public is deeply divided over issues. So it was inevitable that controversy over governmental power and freedom of the press should erupt in the current climate of opinion, a climate formed in part by the unprecedented crises that the nation has been experiencing since the holocaust of World War II and its Cold War aftermath. Now the nation is contending with deep divisions—between a younger generation which accuses its elders of enshrining materialism, practicing materialism, and contaminating the atmosphere; between minorities who charge their fellow citizens with racist tendencies that bar the way to equal opportunity; between rich and poor, the citydweller and the suburbanite, the hawks and the doves.

The nation's press reflects these divisions. Its coverage is frequently apocalyptic; dwelling on crime, drugs, violence, corruption, welfare scandals, pollution, financial crisis—and the prolonged war in Indochina. It should come as no surprise that there has been increasing hostility and a widening credibility gap between the government and the press and between the press and the public. Unquestionable the media are not blameless. On the contrary, over the years their irresponsible scrambling for reader and viewer attention has only led many to look with skepticism at what they see on their television screens and to doubt what they read in their papers. Unfortunately, Vice President Spiro T. Agnew's criticisms, which created so much perturbation in the media and received so much approbation among sections of the public, have not helped matters. On the contrary, his attacks increased the acrimony and suspicion. In the last few years, news organizations have protested the issuance of subpoenas by federal grand juries ordering newsmen to testify and to produce notes, tapes, films, financial records, and other data sought by federal prosecutors in their investigations of left-wing militants and Black Panthers. Complaints were made that government agents were posing as newsmen to gather information on radical groups. It was in this troubled atmosphere that the Twentieth Century Fund assembled an independent Task Force on Governmental Power and Press Freedom, made up of jurists, lawyers and journalists.

Originally, we had intended to confine our study to the questions of subpoenas, law-enforcement agents posing as newsmen, official harassment of the so-called underground press and the government's criticisms—and investigations—of news judgments. But in the midst of our deliberations, we were confronted with the latest and most celebrated clash between government and press: the publishing of The Pentagon Papers and the attempts by the Nixon Administration to halt further publication. This collision, in which the right of the press to publish the classified material was upheld by the Supreme Court, is treated in a separate section of this report.

In our discussions, which were frequently far-ranging and always spirited, the task force did not feel it necessary to dwell overlong on the critical linkages between democracy, which depends on an informed citizenry, and the press, which is the purveyor of information to the public. But we all were well aware that the public has the biggest stake of all in seeing to it that the nation's press is protected against governmental intrusion or pressure. It is a truism that the public gets the newspapers it deserves, but we feel that the public has a right to fuller and fairer information than it has been getting. If government officials have sometimes been irresponsible toward the press, it is our view that the press has not always been responsible toward the public it serves.

We are in agreement that the nation's press must exhibit greater balance in its news judgments and higher ethical standards from its practitioners. All too often, the performance of journalists, particularly in dealing with governmental affairs, has been marked by a lack of basic understanding, by easy acceptance of "handout" information and by a misdirected passion for the headline or scoop. It is the task force's belief that journalism must clear itself of James Reston's charge that "most American newspaper people are really more interested in dramatic spot news, the splashy story, than in anything else. They want to be in on the big blowout, no matter how silly, and would rather write about what happened than whether it made any sense."

There is another problem of "access," involving press-public relations rather than press-government relations. That is the problem of affording the public, i.e., the individual citizen or groups of citizens, access to the news media.

Ben M. Bagdikian has noted, "In a large, urbanized society, individual free speech doesn't guarantee access to the marketplace of ideas," and he cites the suggestion of Professor Jerome A. Barron of George Washington University Law School that the interpretation of the First Amendment be expanded "to include the right of the individual to have a fair chance at access to the press, with the courts or legislatures deciding what is fair." That would seem a rather ponderous, time-consuming and costly way for an individual to seek a forum: but it must be acknowledged that although the path to the press is open through letters-to-the-editor columns, it is a very narrow path. For the broadcast media it is practically a closed path for a multitude of reasons including libel considerations, physical accessibility and cost. Still, it is inherent in the First Amendment that free speech is not completely free if it cannot find a free forum. Ultimately, a situation could arise in which government saw reason to intervene to assure access to the press, at which point the question of freedom would pose new uncertainties.

The difficult task of governing—and communicating in—a pluralistic society calls for greater responsibility on the part of both public officials and newsmen. That responsibility must begin at local and state levels, where mutual trust should be the keystone for effective conduct of public affairs. Unfortunately, this is not always the case. School, housing, health, and zoning boards have often tended to conduct public business in private meetings; when subsequent reports in the press, not unnaturally, are presented as exposés, the consequence is angry exchanges between government and press that confuse and distort public understanding. The problem becomes even more sensitive when newsmen venture into investigations of crime. It is an open secret that most stories of civic corruption stem from public officials with private knowledge willing to direct newsmen to incriminating evidence. If there has been any single ethic in American journalism it is that newsmen are prepared to protect such confidential news sources, likening their responsibility to the relationship existing between the clergy and their parishioners, doctors and patients, lawyers and clients.

The task force has sought to resolve the difficult problems confronting newsmen who are subpoenaed in order to get them to divulge confidential information. Until very recently, newsmen have not thought in terms or requiring legal protection, largely because they have felt themselves covered by the First Amendment. But the Supreme Court has before it three cases rooted in government subpoena issues, and unless the Court's determinations are broader than now anticipated, a majority of the task force favors recommendations to prevent the compelled disclosure of confidences by newsmen that might reduce or impair the flow of information to the public.

The task force also dealt with the attempts by governmental bodies to delve into the editorial judgments of the media. We welcomed the action of the House of Representatives in refusing to cite for contempt the Columbia Broadcasting System and its chief executive for declining to produce unpublished film and other background material demanded by a House Commerce subcommittee in an effort to investiagte charges that the network had used some material out of context in the documentary "The Selling of the Pentagon." As we see it, the government lacks the legal authority to question the editorial judgments of the media, including television, radio and the underground press, which, according to some observers, can trace its origins to Tom Paine's Common Sense.

In studying the issues raised by publication of the Pentagon Papers, the task force found that the press did not challenge the government's right to protect confidential information affecting the security of the nation, its military forces and its diplomatic negotiations. The record of the press throughout two great wars and the protracted Cold War has been remarkable in its voluntary observance of security regulations. To be sure, the extent of federal classification procedures has been a vexing one. The press, under the rallying cry of "The People's Right to Know," has often been restive under what it regards as a paper curtain of excessive suppression. The system, if it can be called that, has spawned the practice of declassification by "leak," which became the focal battle over the Pentagon Papers. In supporting the right of newspapers to publish the material, the courts held that the administration had failed to demonstrate damage to essential national security. As Associate Justice Potter Stewart noted in his decision, "when everything is classified, then nothing is classified, and the system becomes one to be disregarded by the cynical and careless and to be manipulated by those intent on self-protection or self-promotion."

Each of the subjects covered by our report is important for a free press and an informed public. Our recommendations are designed to strengthen the press in its essential task of providing the public with information and to preserve a healthy adversary relationship between the press and the government. In our view, the health of that relationship is bound to suffer if publishers and editors bow to economic or political pressures and restrain reporters from adequate investigation or if public officials restrict or interfere with journalists in the performance of their professional duties.

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The members of the task force represent different disciplines and views. We did not reach unanimous agreement on all of the many complicated issues before us. (Dissents are listed in the text.) But we shared in common a concern about governmental infringements, actual or potential, on the nation's press, and held in common a faith in the value of free press as a disseminator of information to the public. Because we believe that a free and responsible press is, as William Ernest Hocking put it, "inseparable from the general meaning of freedom in a modern state," and because we are convinced with Learned Hand that "right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues than through any kind of authoritative solution," the independent Task Force on Governmental Power and Press Freedom makes the following recommendations:

PRESS SUBPOENAS

An adequate newsman's privilege should be incorporated into the law to protect the flow of information through the press to the public.

Confidences and Press Photographs

The privilege should apply to personal testimony and records of journalists and to records of news organizations that might lead to the disclosure of confidential sources or of other confidential information.

The privilege should be available to all journalists, including personnel of the "underground," collegiate and minority press.

The privilege should extend to testimony before grand juries, preliminary hearings, trials, administrative hearings, legislative investigations and other bodies having the power of contempt.

The privilege should authorize journalists to withhold the identities of confidential sources, as well as information given in confidence, and notes, tapes and other records of confidential communications.

If the privilege is to be qualified, the qualifications should be as narrow and specific as possible. This could be done by specifying that if newsmen possess information about particular violent crimes, such as murder or kidnapping, they may be compelled to testify.

In civil trials the privilege should be limited so that journalists cannot invoke it in order to avoid being held accountable for defamatory publications.

The privilege should shield news organizations from being compelled to furnish unpublished photographs or unused television films of events, including rallies, demonstrations and disturbances.

Secret Testimony

The privilege should shield journalists from having to appear for questioning before grand juries or other secret investigative agencies to the following extent: that when a subpoenaed newsman can make a showing that his newsgathering capacity would be seriously damaged merely by his entry into the secrecy of the interrogation room, then the official who subpoenaed him should be required to demonstrate a compelling need for his testimony before the journalist could be required to appear.

INVESTIGATIONS OF THE BROADCAST MEDIA

The public's need—and the value of democracy—of the fullest possible information can be threatened by Congressional investigations of editorial judgments, as well as by the Federal Communications Commission's questioning of editorial content.

Because of the threat to press freedom posed by such governmental investigative efforts as the attempt by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to subpoena unpublished material from the CBS documentary film, "The Selling of the Pentagon," no arm of the government should attempt to use the subpoena power to obtain the unpublished material of newsmen—whether in the regulated broadcast media or not.

Because similar threats to the rights of a fully informed public can be posed by the Federal Communications Commission's questioning of editorial content in determining whether to grant or revoke licenses, a group of experts in the law and in broadcast journalism should undertake a careful study of how best to reconcile the competing values of journalistic freedom and governmental regulation.

POLICE POSING AS JOURNALISTS

The chief officers of all law enforcement and other public agencies that seek intelligence about domestic groups—and particularly those agencies that have permitted their agents to pose as journalists—should publicly disapprove of these masquerades and should take steps to ensure that they do not happen in the future.

Law enforcement agencies should abandon the practice of employing journalists as informants. As citizens, journalists may choose to volunteer information to the police, but the payment of any money by the police to a journalist—either for "expenses" or for services rendered—in connection with the disclosure of information is tantamount to infiltration of journalism by the police and should be stopped.

THE UNDERGROUND PRESS

The underground press should be considered entitled to all legal and constitutional rights applicable to other elements of the press, and all actions by public officials that discriminate against the underground press by subjecting it to arrests, searches, seizures or other official acts of harassment or intimidation should be vigorously opposed by the "established" press.

The professional associations of journalism should form legal defense funds to aid underground publications when they are subjected to unlawful pressures from government officials.

FINDINGS

PRESS SUBPOENAS

The present tension between the press and government was brought into focus by a series of subpoenas that have been issued by federal and state prosecutors over the past two years in efforts to compel newsmen to disclose information obtained from confidential sources. These subpoenas have raised in the clearest form the central issue: that the government's law enforcement efforts—particularly those directed at political radicals—are taking forms that pose a serious threat to the confidence between journalists and their sources, thus reducing the free flow of information to the public. In some instances, journalists have been forced to be ready sources of evidence for the government, serving as an investigative arm of law enforcement.

In the matter of the press subpoenas, the issue has been brought swiftly before the United States Supreme Court. Three newsmen, Earl Caldwell of the New York Times, Paul M. Branzburg of the Louisville Courier-Journal, and Paul Pappas of WTEV-TV in New Bedford, Massachusetts, were subpoenaed and refused to testify. In each instance secret grand jury testimony was demanded. Mr. Caldwell and Mr. Pappas were called to testify about black radicals; Mr. Branzburg was to be questioned about alleged marijuana and hashish offenses. Each man asserted that to testify would destroy his confidential relationships with his sources and would impede the flow of information to the public. They contended that the First Amendment's free press guarantee thus shields them from having to comply with the subpoenas. The Supreme Court will hear arguments on the three cases during the 1972 Court term.

The Supreme Court's decisions in these cases will be its first regarding the protection, if any, extended by the First Amendment to journalists in the news-gathering process. Previous decisions by the Supreme Court have dealt solely with newsmen's rights to publish the news. Thus these forthcoming decisions are likely to go far toward determining the extent to which newsmen may be shielded by the Constitution from being compelled to testify about information received in confidence. Since the common law does not recognize a "newsman's privilege," if the Court should hold that the First Amendment grants little or no protection from subpoenas, then important public decisions will have to be made as to whether Congress and the state legislatures should pass "shield" laws to protect newsmen from being forced to disclose confidences.

The members of the task force state no opinion, of course, as to the First Amendment issues posed by the pending Supreme Court cases. But we agree that press subpoenas pose a threat to the free flow of information to the public. Some of us feel that the First Amendment covers the news-gathering process completely, constituting a "newsman's privilege" that shields journalists from being required to disclose confidences under any circumstances; those members who take this point of view argue against the enactment of "shield" statutes for fear they would narrow constitutional privilege. Others feel that legislation is generally better suited than constitutional rulings to creating a complete and detailed newsman's privilege. But since the Supreme Court's forthcoming decisions may well determine whether newsmen's privilege is to be based on the First Amendment or on statutes, the task force has decided to confine its views to those details that will have to be considered, whether by judges or by legislators. It is hoped that these views of the task force will provide helpful insights to those who will eventually deal with this important problem of governmental power and press freedom.

Competing values of press freedom and law enforcement effectiveness will undoubtedly have to be resolved. Critics of a newsman's privilege argue that there is scant empirical proof that the lack of a privilege has a significant impact upon the flow of news. They say that many reporters can convince their sources that the journalists would go to jail before betraying a confidence. Moreover, critics suggest that many news sources want to get their views before the public and are willing to take the risk that their confidences might be disclosed.

In contrast, those who support the privilege claim that there is even less proof that law enforcement would be handicapped, other than in rare, extraordinary situations, if it could not subpoena newsmen. They point out that press subpoenas have usually been issued in two situations: when radical groups are being investigated and reporters are known to have some knowledge of the radicals' affairs; and when reporters have published articles publicizing the existence of consensual or "victimless" crimes, prosecutors may be tempted to use press subpoenas because evidence is difficult to obtain by other means.

The task force believes that the mere existence of legal controls over press subpoenas would discourage their use. In the year that has passed since Attorney General John N. Mitchell issued guidelines governing the subpoenaing of newsmen by Justice Department lawyers, only three such subpoenas have been issued—a marked decline over the previous year.

The subpoenas issued over the past two years reveal that the question of newsmen's privilege has become vastly more complicated than it appeared to be only a few years ago. Eighteen states now have "shield" laws establishing a newsman's privilege.[1] Although many of these laws were passed within the last decade, most are already obsolete because they protect journalists only from having to reveal the names of their sources. The current subpoena controversy has underscored the inadequancy of the law in most jurisdictions to protect the lines of communication from news sources to the public. The task force has concluded that legal reforms are needed in a number of areas to assure that the free flow of information is not curtailed.

1. Defining the press.—The task force recommends that the newsman's privilege be designed to shield the press as an institution in its efforts to gather and disseminate the news. It should reach beyond daily newspapers to protect the periodical, minority, underground and collegiate press, the broadcast media, newsletter and news services. It also should extend beyond actual newsgatherers to cover editors and other supervisory personnel.

Surprisingly, some of the state newsman's privilege statutes fail to cover classes of journalists who often need protection most. Several of these laws do not cover the broadcast media. Some do not protect magazine writers. Even the broad New York "shield" law fails to cover the underground and the collegiate press.

Because any privilege can be expected to exact a price by limiting the truth-finding functions of the courts, the task force believes that privilege should not be extended beyond the limits necessary to protect the regular flow of information to the public through the efforts of journalists. Accordingly we are of the opinion that the newsman's privilege should cover only those persons engaged in gathering, writing, editing, producing and supervising the collection of information for dissemination in such media as newspapers, news services, newsletters, periodicals, radio and television.

2. Privilege against being required to disclose confidential sources or information.—The task force recommends, subject to qualifications discussed later, that when a reporter is subpoenaed to give testimony, he should have the right to withhold the identity of his sources, plus any information received in confidence and any information that will damage his confidential relationship. It follows from this recommendation that his notes, tapes or other records of confidential communications should also be privileged.

We recognize that reporters may feel that they should testify and that they can do so without undermining press freedom and therefore recommend that the law should not preclude the posing of such questions to journalists, so that they can respond if they deem it appropriate to do so.

3. Privilege against being required to appear to testify.—Some lawyers and journalists have argued that the reporter's privilege should not merely protect reporters from having to disclose confidential sources or confidential information, but that in some instances it should also shield them from having to testify about any matters in secret. This was the argument made by Earl Caldwell of the New York Times. He asserted that by merely entering the grand jury room, with its secret interrogation, he would appear to be cooperating with the government in its investigation of the Black Panthers. Such a step would seriously undermine his capacity to obtain information in the future, he contended, and would violate his First Amendment rights as a newsman. The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit agreed. It held that "where it has been shown that the public's First Amendment right to be informed would be jeopardized by requiring a journalist to submit to secret grand jury interrogation, the government must respond by demonstrating a compelling need for the witnesses' presence before judicial process properly can issue to require attendance."

The Ninth Circuit noted that the district court had already held that Mr. Caldwell could not be forced to disclose confidential information unless the government could demonstrate "a compelling and overriding national interest in requiring Mr. Caldwell's testimony which cannot be served by any alternative means." As the Ninth Circuit saw it, this meant that Mr. Caldwell could not be required to tell the grand jury more than he had written in his article—an exercise that would probably be a waste of time for all concerned. It concluded that nothing would be lost to the government if it were required to make a showing of "compelling" need before even subpoenaing Mr. Caldwell to enter the grand jury room.

The task force recommends a broad newsman's privilege against journalists having to disclose confidential sources, or information received in confidence. Armed with this protection, newsmen should be subject to the normal subpoena power of grand juries, except in extraordinary circumstances. We state no opinion as to the First Amendment issue confronting the Supreme Court in the Caldwell case. But to legislatures considering creation of a reporter's privilege, the task force recommends that where a subpoenaed reporter can make a showing that his or her news-gathering capacity would be seriously damaged merely by entry into the secrecy of the grand jury room, then the prosecutor should be required to demonstrate a compelling need for the testimony before the journalist could be required to appear.[3]

4. Photographs and films.—A particularly troublesome problem arises when the government seeks to subpoena unpublished still photographs or unused television film taken by news cameramen at public meetings, demonstrations or disturbances. In such situations there is not an orthodox confidential relationship, since participants at the event know that their pictures may be published. But it is also understood that the photographer is a neutral recorder. Photographers are not expected to serve as an investigative arm of the prosecution by supplying photographs of persons who were not included in the published or broadcast pictures. To force them to act as such through subpoenas would do more than breach this implied confidence—it would probably subject photographers to attacks from participants in such events, and would reduce the news photographers' ability to cover the news.

The courts have not yet had an opportunity to work out the proper limits of this aspect of the reporter's privilege. Some newspapers have refused to give the government more than glossy prints of photographs that were published; one has compromised by turning over other photographs of individuals who were identifiable in published pictures.

Whenever the issue has been raised, it has exposed deeply conflicting values. Prosecutors, believing that newspaper or television files may contain filmed proof of guilt in arson or riot cases, have sought to get that material. Defendants, hoping that newspaper, magazine and television films will prove their absence at riots, have also attempted to subpoena film from the media. Journalists, having no desire to protect any person who was photographed committing a crime but realizing that the media's role as observer will suffer if it becomes recognized as a ready source of evidence, have balked. Some publications and television stations have begun routinely to destroy film that might be subpoenaed—a strong indication of the need for a reasoned legal solution.

The task force's studies reveal that this problem usually arises in such circumstances as riots or demonstrations, in which photographers who are present at a public place to photograph actions by a group record activities that are subsequently alleged to have been unlawful. For example, prosecutors have sought to subpoena the photograph files of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch after the burning of an ROTC building following a demonstration on the campus of Washington University and to subpoena photographs taken by the University of Maryland's campus newspaper of a violent demonstration on the campus; California officers have made use of a search warrant in an attempt to seize incriminating photos of a student disturbance from the Stanford Daily; and officials in Washington, D.C., have tried to obtain photographs taken by Washington newspapers of destructive demonstrations at Howard University.

The task force believes that in situation such as these, news organizations should be privileged not to furnish any photographs or films beyond those that were published. Normally, the most descriptive pictures will be published by the media, and to make others available solely for the purpose of aiding one side or the other in a legal action would compromise the neutral position of the press.

It must be emphasized that the ultimate interest at stake is the public's access to information, not a possessive attitude by the news media toward its pictures. Obviously, the line of least resistance for the press would be to surrender the photographs. But journalists know that if they become a ready source of court evidence news photographers will lose the free access to events that they now usually enjoy—and that if such access is lost, it is the public's view of news events that will suffer.[3]

5. Records of news organizations.—Sometimes records of a newspaper or television network's telephone calls, disbursements, expense accounts or other records can disclose the identity of a source as unerringly as the compelled testimony of a reporter. There have been instances in recent months in which prosecutors have attempted to subpoena such records. The task force recommends that when a news organization can show that a subpoena calls for documents or other evidence that would disclose confidential sources or information, then the subpoenaed organization should be privileged not to produce them.

6. Qualifications.—Some of the state shield laws create an unqualified journalist's privilege. Others qualify the privilege in one of two ways: (a) by declaring that a judge may divest a journalist of the privilege and order him to testify under certain general circumstances, such as "to prevent a miscarriage of justice," or "to protect the public interest"; or (b) by stating that in investigations of certain crimes, such as murder, kidnapping, or those that pose "a threat to human life," the privilege is revoked.

The theory behind these qualifications is that society will benefit more from obtaining information in exigent circumstances than from protecting journalistic confidences. Appealing claims can be made for qualifying the reporter's privilege to allow for such exigencies. It is difficult to argue that a reporter should be permitted to stand mute in, say, a kidnap case when a child's life is at stake. Yet any reporter's privilege will be weakened to the extent that it can be waived and it is possible that such exceptions can swallow the rule—that is, the privilege can be so easily divested that news sources will have no assurance that their confidences will actually be protected by the law.

A majority of the task force believes that, as a practical matter, no "safety valve" qualifications are needed.[4] A journalist is rarely given information about a grave criminal offense; but when he is, the information is usually published. In the even rarer event that a journalist receives such information and believes so strongly in the need for confidentiality that he neither publishes it nor volunteers it to the police, it is doubtful that he would divulge it under any circumstances. This reasoning about the practicalities of the reporter's privilege seems to have been borne out in practice. In states with statutes that do not qualify the privilege it has encountered no major objections. The New York State Legislature, which recently had a careful study of the problem done before enacting a detailed shield statute, did not qualify the privilege.

Although most task force members saw no need for safety valves, they acknowledged that there are some strong arguments in favor of qualification. All of us believe that if the privilege is to be qualified, the qualifications should be as narrow as possible. But a majority of the task force does not favor the general "public interest" qualifications. The application of such a qualification usually comes at a time of great public concern over a newsman's refusal to testify about such emotionally charged and politically sensitive subjects as the narcotics trade or corruption of public officials. Under these circumstances the pressures will always be strong for the trial judge to conclude that it would be in the public interest for the journalist to testify.

Accordingly, a majority of the task force recommends that if there are qualifications, they must be stated as precisely as possible in the statute, so that the reporter and his or her source can know, at the time when confidential information is passed, whether the journalist will be protected by the shield law from having to identify sources. This qualification might be achieved by specifying in the law that if reporters have information concerning particular heinous crimes, such as murder or kidnapping, they may be compelled to testify.

7. Where the privilege should apply.—The task force believes that the privilege for newsmen should apply before grand juries, preliminary hearings, criminal trials, administrative hearings, legislative investigations and other official bodies that have contempt levying power to compel testimony. Civil suits raise special considerations of press freedom and responsibility, but they do not involve similar problems of conflicting public interests. Yet American society seems to be entering a phase of increased interest in corporate responsibility and consumer rights. Journalistic muckraking into corporate and business affairs is on the rise. We recommend that some form of journalist's privilege be observed in civil litigation, in order to keep open the avenues of information about corporate affairs. If exceptions are required, they must be drawn so that reporters cannot use the privilege improperly when they or their publication are defendants in a civil suit for libel or violation of privacy. This limitation is especially required when the plaintiff is faced with a First Amendment burden that prevents him from winning his suit unless he can show that the newspaper printed a false and defamatory story without making an adequate effort to check the facts. Assuming that a broad journalist's privilege will be recognized by the courts or legislatures, rules will have to be worked out to lift the privilege when a journalist-defendant invokes it to shield his own failure to check the facts adequately.

INVESTIGATIONS OF THE BROADCAST MEDIA

An essential corollary of the principle of press freedom is broad protection. To insist on the First Amendment rights of newspapers and magazines but not of the electronic media invites governmental encroachment on all forms of news gathering and dissemination. For if government acts as arbiter over the editorial affairs of the electronic media, controlling them in the guise of "legislative oversight" or regulations of the Federal Communications Commission, then a principle has been established which may eventually be applied to other forms of free expression.

There is, of course, some justification for government's involvement in the editorial affairs of television and radio. Anyone with sufficient determination and capital can publish a newspaper, but only so many channels are available to television, and these by right belong to the public. The allocation of these channels must therefore pass through the Congress and the FCC.

The task force recognizes that this regulatory obligation creates serious conflicts between the "public interest" and the First Amendment. The nature of the "public interest," after all, is difficult to define, which means that government must tread very lightly, if it treads at all. There is no disputing its right to intervene against fraudulent or misleading advertising.

Regulation of television content is a problem because it is the nation's major—or most popular—source of news and news commentary. The television documentary, moreover, has become an important addition to the news process. It is assumed the networks, as well as individual stations, operating under public sufferance, are impartial in dealing with controversial issues. But a growing number of persons believe television has sometimes permitted its reporters, writers and producers to slant the truth while presenting the news.

Does this belief warrant governmental interference in the editorial process? Does the obvious fact that the television viewer cannot take his trade elsewhere give the Congress and the FCC the right to impose punitive measures on television when, in their judgment, television exceeds the bounds of editorial probity?

These are difficult questions; they become manageable only if the concept of freedom of expression remains paramount.

These strictures can be but cold comfort for the television industry. Television stations are faced with winning renewal of their licenses every three years. If, for one reason or another, they invite the displeasure of groups which can gain the ear of the FCC, they are faced with a possibility of a loss of license. Worse still, a network can be brought before a Congressional committee to explain its editorial judgments on pain of a contempt citation if it refuses to lend itself to editorial second-guessing, which was the experience of CBS News with its documentary, "The Selling of the Pentagon."

There is very little dispute over the facts in the case. On February 23, 1971, CBS News broadcast a documentary on the activities of the Defense Department. Its thesis was that the Pentagon spent millions of the taxpayers' dollars in an effort to sell its military programs. "The Selling of the Pentagon" was praised by some as a contribution to the public's knowledge of military chicanery, but drew criticism for being misleading and heavily slanted from others.

The task force believes the merits or demerits of the broadcast are irrelevant as is the evidence that CBS edited interviews of at least two Pentagon officials in a manner which led to charges of deception. In one instance, a statement of Assistant Secretary of Defense Daniel Z. Henkin in answer to a question from a CBS interviewer was attached to the response of a subsequent question. In another, a quotation from a speech by Colonel John A. MacNeil was made to appear as if he were expressing his own views. According to the complete text of his statement, he was quoting another person, though he seemed to agree with the views he was quoting.

The result was an outcry from certain members of Congress demanding an investigation of CBS. Chairman Harley O. Staggers of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has legislative jurisdiction over the FCC and the radio-television industry, scheduled an investigation, and on May 26, 1971, a subpoena was served on Dr. Frank Stanton, president of CBS. The subpoena directed him to submit "all film, workprints, out-takes, and sound-tape recordings, written scripts and/or transcripts utilized in whole or in part by CBS in connection with" the documentary.

Dr. Stanton appeared before the Staggers Committee but refused to produce the materials demanded of him. "If newsmen are told that their notes, films, and tapes will be subject to compulsory process so that the government can determine whether the news has been satisfactorily edited, the scope, nature, and vigor of their news gathering and reporting will inevitably be curtailed," Dr. Stanton said. He insisted that no committee of the Congress has the power to "engage in official surveillance of journalistic judgments" by investigating particular news reports for distortion.

Representative Staggers replied that the subpoena was a proper exercise of his committee's supervision of the television industry. The broadcast media have the capacity to change and manipulate the recorded statements of individuals, he added, so that legislation might be required to prevent deceptive news editing. He went on to argue that both the public and those filmed by CBS have First Amendment rights equal to those of the television medium. When Dr. Stanton still refused, the committee voted to recommend that CBS and Dr. Stanton be cited for contempt of Congress. In a rare refusal of the House to support such action by one of its committees, the contempt citation was voted down.

It is the position of the task force that this retreat from the committee recommendation, while commendable, left the question of governmental intrusion into television's editorial process up in the air. Representative Staggers and a majority of his committee still apparently believe that their mandate to regulate the radio and television industries gives them the right to employ the subpoena power to second-guess journalistic judgments of the broadcast news media. As the task force sees it, this view ignores a critical distinction between the government's power to prevent deception on quiz shows and commercial advertisements and its responsibility, if any, to supervise the quality and accuracy of news. The difference is the First Amendment.

The task force believes that Congress has no more power to subpoena the files of a broadcast news organization in an effort to investigate its journalistic judgments than it has to subpoena the editorial files of a newspaper for the same purpose. Precisely because the broadcast media do exist under governmental regulation, there are strong reasons why this principle should be firmly established.

It is important to recognize the distinction between the constitutional validity of a press subpoena issued for the purpose of investigating a journalistic decision, and a subpoena issued in the course of an investigation of events outside the realm of journalism. An example of the latter is the Earl Caldwell case. His unpublished material was sought in connection with an investigation of alleged crimes by Black Panthers. The Supreme Court has yet to say to what extent, if any, the First Amendment protects a journalist's unpublished materials from such subpoenas. There is considerable doubt that a subpoena is valid when it is issued to obtain information for a governmental inquiry into the handling of unpublished material itself.

Because the government has the power to withdraw a radio or television station's license, journalists in the broadcast media may be particularly susceptible to the "chilling" effect of governmental second-guessing of their work. In the event that their materials were subject to subpoena, they would be under strong pressure to trim their sails when criticizing the government. For if a strong news item might provoke an investigation, and the government had the power to subpoena the "out-takes" from a television film or the words omitted from the final draft of a news comment, some fault might be found with their editorial judgments. Station licenses—and jobs—could be at stake, so that radio and television journalists would be working under an inhibiting burden. Whenever an editorial decision required subtle and delicate balancing of various considerations, the journalist would be aware that some official or Congressman, who might be offended by the article, might make a public issue of the editing—with the station's license perhaps at stake. Such a condition would lead to curtailment of robust reporting of controversial issues affecting the government—precisely what the First Amendment seeks to prevent. The task force believes, therefore, that no arm of the government has the legal authority to issue a subpoena for a reporter's unpublished material.

The task force realizes that the relationship of radio-television to government is a highly complex one, and that to insist that broadcast journalists' unused materials be given the same constitutional protection as the notes of newspapermen and women does not resolve all the tensions between government regulation and free expression. Under a regulatory system a radio or television station can lose its license because of the editorial content of its news and public service broadcasts, which poses a threat of subtle governmental control and self-censorship discouraging bold and forceful expression. Yet we recognize that it is not tenable to assert that a licensee of one of the limited number of broadcast channels should be permitted to use its monopoly of that channel to discredit, malign or ignore groups in the community.

To resolve the conflict between these competing values of journalistic freedom and governmental regulation is an issue of great importance and extreme difficulty, one that is beyond the scope of this study and the expertise of this task force. The task force urges that a group of experts experienced in the law and the broadcast media undertake a careful study of these problems.

POLICE POSING AS JOURNALISTS

In recent months a series of unrelated and apparently uncoordinated instances have come to light in which personnel of government intelligence and law enforcement agencies have posed as news reporters or photographers. In a variation of this practice, law enforcement agencies have paid reporters and press to obtain material for governmental use. These incidents appear to be regrettably widespread, both geographically and organizationally. They have occurred from Washington to Saigon and within the Army, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and local police forces.

Whether such incidents were common in the past and were undiscovered is not known. But it does seem significant that a rash of these occurrences has come to light within the past two years, almost in rhythm with the rising tempo of dissent, violence and official concern about political protest and violence. In fact, most of the instances that have been discovered involved police investigations of political dissenters—groups about which the public should be as fully informed as possible. However, the frequency with which police have been found to be posing as newsmen has tended to raise barriers of suspicion that have made it more difficult for the press to cover many events.

The limited time and investigative means at the disposal of the task force did not permit exhaustive verification of all incidents that were brought to its attention. But we have verified that at least fourteen such events have occurred:

In Saigon, in 1969, two U.S. agents were found to have infiltrated the press corps.

The Army Security Agency painted a van with the name of a non-existent television company and filmed demonstrators at the Democratic National Convention in 1968.

Army intelligence agents also posed as TV cameramen during the Presidential Inauguration activities in Washington in January 1969.

In July 1970, a female intelligence agent for the District of Columbia police department posed as a reporter to gain access to a welfare-rights group's meeting.

Army intelligence agents obtained press credentials from the New York City Police Department to cover actions of H. Rap Brown and Stokely Carmichael in New York during the summer riots of 1967.

In Wichita, Kansas, press credentials were given to local policemen during a visit by Vice President Agnew in October 1970.

A member of the Chicago Police Department's Intelligence Division was discovered in March 1971 posing as a newsman to gain information from black students at a protest rally.

Two plainclothes officers of the Nassau County, N.Y., police force posed as photographers for a weekly newspaper in order to photograph the audience at a veterans' antiwar rally.

An Army agent masqueraded as a reporter for the Richmond Times Dispatch to obtain information on the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

A Detroit policeman posed as a news photographer to observe a General Motors stockholders' meeting in May 1970.

In Albuquerque a city policeman posed as an Associated Press photographer at the University of New Mexico campus during demonstrations protesting the invasion of Cambodia in the spring of 1970.

Complaints by newsmen covering July 4, 1971, ceremonies in San Juan, Puerto Rico, that police were posing as reporters led to an admission by the Commonwealth Secretary that his department had been issuing press credentials to police for about eight years.

At a draft-card burning demonstration outside the Supreme Court in June of 1968, reporters for the Washington Post and Boston Globe spotted, along with the familiar faces of the Washington press, men whom they recognized as F.B.I. agents using television cameras and tape recorders to interview the demonstrators.[5]

In the spring of 1971, a man recognized as an F.B.I. agent by Pulitzer Prize-winning reporter Jack Nelson of the Los Angeles Times was observed taking notes with reporters at a meeting called by Congressman William R. Anderson of Tennessee to discuss the Berrigan conspiracy prosecution. The man denied he was an F.B.I. agent, insisting that he was a writer; but he ran away when asked by a congressional aide to identify himself. The aide followed the man outside the building and saw him enter a car. Life magazine reported a check of the license plates later traced the car to the F.B.I.

All but one of these incidents involved police or intelligence agents masquerading as journalists to gather information about dissident groups or to investigate other "political" matters. The reason seems obvious: law enforcement agencies tend to be ill-informed about political dissenters who do not fit the traditional "criminal" mold, and reporters often have easy access to them. However, when policemen masquerade as reporters, the same kind of forces come into play that arise when journalists are subpoenaed, except that the effect is more direct. As in the subpoena situation, the target groups are usually highly suspicious of officialdom and "establishment" institutions and are likely to freeze the press out at any indication that the media are serving law enforcement. This suspiciousness is compounded when the dissenters have good reason to believe that the "journalist" or "news cameraman" who takes such interest in their activities may very well be reporting to City Hall rather than to the city desk.

The task force considers that the hostility and distrust demonstrated by some radical groups toward the press is due, at least in part, to such practices on the part of the police. Journalists have been assaulted by militants and excluded from their meetings, but the most serious threat posed by these police tactics is to the public. It cannot be fully informed of developments within all elements of our society if law enforcement authorities resort to masquerading and subornation.

[5] These incidents are documented and discussed in fuller detail in the background paper below.

The principal reason why they should be stopped is not that they made the reporter's job more difficult, but that they may on occasion make the job impossible.

It seems likely that the increased use of such tactics will rapidly dissipate their usefulness to the police. As such incidents come to public notice, people will become reluctant to give important information to "reporters" not known to them; as reporters are increasingly frozen out of dissenters' meetings, so will the masquerading police agents be. In the end, law enforcement as well as the public will be shorter on information than before.

The task force condemns this form of masquerading by the police. It endangers the integrity of the press and renders it less effective in performing its responsibilities to society.

The task force notes that police officials in New York City, Chicago, Detroit and the District of Columbia have issued orders condemning the practice of police agents posing as newsmen. The Defense Department has issued an order that "there shall be no covert or otherwise deceptive surveillance or penetration of civilian organization unless specifically authorized by the Secretary of Defense or his designee." This order is regarded by Pentagon officials as prohibiting agents from posing as journalists.

In response to an inquiry from this task force, F.B.I. Director J. Edgar Hoover replied in a letter, "F.B.I. agents are not permitted to pose as reporters or press photographers in the course of their investigations."[6]

The task force is also concerned with a related practice in which the F.B.I. has been involved—compensating journalists for "services and expenses" involved in information-gathering. During the riot-conspiracy trail of the "Chicago Seven." in 1969, two journalists—Louis Salzberg and Carl Gilman—testified for the prosecution and said they had been paid for years as informants for the F.B.I. Mr. Salzberg, a photographer who began his connections with radicals as a staff member for a Spanish-language newspaper, acknowledged at the time that his F.B.I. salary had been $600 a month for at least one year. Mr. Gilman, a television newsman from San Diego, received about $10,000 for pay and expenses over a two-year period. Neither of the men was recruited by the F.B.I., but both began receiving compensation after they initiated the arrangements.

When the task force inquired of the Justice Department about the use of journalists as informants, John W. Hushen, Director of Public Information, sent the following reply "prepared by Director Hoover":

The FBI accepts from any person information which may be of value in the course of an FBI investigation. The FBI does not now, and never has, actively recruited journalists as informants. However, there is no policy against accepting information from a journalist or any news media representative if it is volunteered, which was the case with Mr. Louis Salzberg and Mr. Carl Gilman. Both of these individuals furnished information to the FBI on a voluntary basis. They were paid for their services and expenses.[7]

While it is true the arrangements in these cases were initiated by the newsmen, the task force cannot accept the characterization of "volunteering" information as an act of citizenship, when the informant, be he a journalist or any citizen, is paid.

When journalists are paid for providing information to the F.B.I. or any other law enforcement agency, the result is an infiltration—and sullying—of the profession. The task force concludes that the practice is damaging to press independence and is wrong. We think that the same considerations that prompted Mr. Hoover not to permit his agents to pose as journalists should preclude the F.B.I. from accepting journalists as paid informants.

The task force also believes that the practice of journalists accepting compensation for providing information is professionally unethical. We believe that a journalist who accepts any compensation for providing information or conducting surveillance for law enforcement officials—during work hours or not—has compromised his own neutrality as a journalist and has damaged the integrity of the journalist's craft.[8]

THE UNDERGROUND PRESS

The journalistic form that is generally known as the "underground press," "the radical press," "the alternative press," and by other names, has been a continual source of controversy in the manner of governmental power versus press freedom. Just as this form of journalism lacks a universally accepted name, so does it defy a precise definition. It has been described by one author as "a wildly unpredictable happening," as a journalistic expression of "abiding bitterness about the State of the Union," and by others as pornographic trash. In quantitative terms, it embraces 300 to 350 newspapers sprinkled across the country, plus about 200 additional publications that appear sporadically or in mimeographed form. They share a style that is irreverent, tolerant of some drugs, explicit about sex, oriented toward the political left, and consistently anti-establishment.

Its anti-establishment tone is significant, for underground publications are almost always out of favor with the local governments and in bad odor with other influential circles of the communities where they are published. They have greater proclivity for antagonizing officialdom than the daily press, yet have little or none of the protective political power of the established press. As the friction between militants of the left and the government has increased in the past few years, so have the occasions upon which local law enforcement officials have been outraged by statements in the underground press.

In 1969 the publisher of the Los Angeles Free Press was fined $1,000 and placed on probation for three years for having published a purloined list of state narcotics agents.

Dallas police raided an underground newspaper in October 1968 and hauled away two tons of material from an underground newspaper in an "obscenity" raid—yet failed to obtain an obscenity conviction that would stand up in Federal Court.

The Police Department of Buffalo, New York, drove the Black Panther newspaper from the streets in August 1970 by announcing its intention to arrest any vendors selling the publication.

Officials in Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Providence and Richmond denied press credentials to the reporters of the local underground newspapers.

During the autumn of 1969, the San Diego Street Journal's office was searched by police without a warrant and its street vendors handcuffed, searched and jailed for loitering and obstructing the sidewalk.

There have been numerous other allegations by the underground press of heavy-handed treatment by law enforcement officials. Orpheus, a bimonthly publication of articles drawn from various underground newspapers, described the situation:

"Although these papers have been evicted from their offices and homes, harassed by the police, had their street sellers arrested en masse, had their benefit parties raided, been bombed, burned, beaten, gypped, framed and lost printer after printer, the underground press continues to increase in size and number."

The task force has listed only those incidents that have been verified in sworn court testimony or reported in the established press, but that is evidence enough to indicate that some laws enforcement officials have used their official authority against the underground press in a way in which it would never have been invoked against the established press. These actions seem to have been based on the erroneous assumption that underground publications forfeit some degree of their protection under the First Amendment when they violate public standards of taste, preach a tolerance of drugs and sex, and criticize the police. There has been a double standard of treatment, one for the underground and one for the established press—a double standard that is inconsistent with the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom for all the press.

Unfortunately, the attitude of the established press toward official harassment of the underground press has been characterized by neglect. Of the numerous instances that were brought to the attention of the task force, instances in which elements of the underground press protested that they had been abused by the police, a majority were not mentioned in either the news or editorial columns of the established press. In those incidents that have developed into court cases, the underground press has been left largely to its own fragile devices by the more affluent elements of the news media. Others in the journalistic profession stood by and gave no aid in three legal actions involving the underground press that produced legal precedents damaging to all journalists—the prosecution of the Los Angeles Free Press for theft in 1969, the subpoenaing of the editor of the Madison Kaleidoscope after the bombing at the University of Wisconsin in 1970, and the denial of press credentials to the Los Angeles Free Press reporters in 1967.

The task force believes the underground press should be entitled to all legal and constitutional rights applicable to other sectors of the press, and all actions by public officials that discriminate against the underground press by subjecting it to arrest, searches, seizures or other official acts of harassment and intimidation should be vigorously opposed by all the press.[9]

In addition we recommend that journalism's professional associations form legal defense funds for the aid of underground publications subjected to unlawful pressures from government officials.

THE PENTAGON PAPERS

A fundamental problem of the relationship between governmental power and the press was posed unexpectedly in June of 1971 when the New York Times, the Washington Post and other newspapers published what have become known as the Pentagon Papers—a group of documents compiled from Defense Department files for a study of the origins of American participation in the Vietnamese war.

The circumstances that surrounded the publication challenged many concepts of the security classification system with which the United States has lived, however uneasily, for a number of decades. The study itself, which had been ordered by Robert S. McNamara while Secretary of Defense, was classified Top Secret. There had been no authorization by any responsible government official for its release to the press. Many of the individual documents, consisting to a great extent of memoranda produced by high officials in the early sixties, were quoted directly by the newspapers without any effort to paraphrase and "fuzz over" their nature. Finally, the sheer bulk of classified material—some 7,000 pages—invited a governmental response. Officialdom could not ignore the papers as it customarily ignores leaks of individual bits of classified information from Washington.

Initially, the government reaction was to seek injunctions in the Federal courts against further publication of the documents, which were being released in serial form. For the purposes of this report, it is unnecessary to trace the various steps of the litigation.[10] The important fact is that on June 30, 1971, the Supreme Court of the United States, by a vote of six to three, dissolved injunctions by lower courts, permitting the newspapers to resume publication.

Even though it decided the case, the Court's decision did not resolve the conflict. The Justices were divided even more deeply than the six to three decision indicated, and each member set forth his own views in separate statements. The Court majority concluded that the government did not have the right to prevent the publication of the specific documents in question. But the judicial door seemed pointedly held open for future prosecutions for having published the papers. It would be fair to sum up the decision as one which told the newspapers that they could publish a specific set of documents at their own risk.

For the press as well as for students of the problems of a free society, the outcome did not clarify, once and for all, the relationship between the press and the government. At the heart of the issue was the question of prepublication restraint—whether there are circumstances under which the government has the right to prevent publication. Journalists and commentators have generally assumed that the government has no such right, whatever may be the legal authority to prosecute after the fact for the publication of material offensive to the law. Very few cases have come up in the Federal courts bearing upon the issue, and in the Pentagon Papers case the government conceded there had been none which raised the problem in the context of national security.

It is worth noting the wide range of attitudes among the Supreme Court Justices on the issue of pre-publication restraint. According to the late Justice Black, "every moment's continuance of the injunctions against these newspapers amounts to a flagrant, indefensible, and continuing violation of the First Amendment"; but according to the late Justice Harlan, prohibiting prior restraints does not reach "to the point of preventing courts from maintaining the status quo long enough to act responsibly in matters of such national importance as those involved here."

[9] Mr. Rock comments in a footnote.

[10] The complete statements of the Judiciary are printed in the appendix.

To Justice Douglas the First Amendment left "no room for governmental restraint on the press." By contrast, Justice Blackmun argued that "the First Amendment, after all, is only one part of an entire Constitution. . . . Each provision of the Constitution is important, and I cannot subscribe to a doctrine of unlimited absolution for the First Amendment at the cost of downgrading other provisions. . . . What is needed here is a weighing, upon properly developed standards, of the broad right of the press to print and of the very narrow right of the Government to prevent." Justice Brennan stated that the First Amendment "tolerates absolutely no prior judicial restraints of the press predicated upon surmise or conjecture that untoward consequences may result," although he conceded that "there is a single, extremely narrow class of cases (when the nation is at war) in which the First Amendment's ban on prior judicial restraint may be overridden."

Justice White held that "prior restraints require an unusually heavy justification under the First Amendment," and concurred in the majority finding because he did not believe the Government had met the test. But Justice Stewart commented that "I am convinced that the Executive is correct with respect to some of the documents involved. But I cannot say that disclosure of any of them will surely result in direct, immediate, and irreparable damage to our Nation or its people. That being so, there can under the First Amendment be but one judicial resolution of the issues before us. I join the judgments of the Court." Justice Marshall noted that Congress has specifically declined to grant the type of authority that the Government sought, adding "It is not for this Court to fling itself into every breach perceived by some Government official nor is it for this Court to take on itself the burden of enacting law, especially law that Congress has refused to pass."

Chief Justice Burger, who dissented from the majority, agreed that there are constitutional limitations on prior restraint. He went on to say that "adherence to this basic constitutional principle, however, does not make this case a simple one. In this case, the imperative of a free and unfettered press comes into collision with another imperative, the effective functioning of a complex modern government and specifically the effective exercise of certain constitutional powers of the executive. Only those who view the First Amendment as an absolute in all circumstances—a view I respect, but reject—can find such a case as this to be simple or easy."

In sum, while basic issues were posed, basic issues were not resolved. The outcome should not be considered a criticism of the Supreme Court. There is good reason to believe that the ends of justice are frequently best served when decisions are made on the narrowest possible grounds, and that sweeping questions of policy are best determined in other arenas. But whatever merit there may be to this view, the fact remains that there is as yet no authoritative concept of whether publication boundaries exist.

The debate outside the courts over publication of the Pentagon Papers centered on questions that were largely irrelevant to the issue of prepublication restraint. Generally speaking, commentators concentrated on such matters as whether the papers proved deception of the public by the government; the propriety of publishing the documents and the vagaries of the classification system. It is probable that most of the public debate reflected attitudes on the war in Vietnam rather than attitudes on press freedom.

In retrospect, it is hardly surprising that the Supreme Court decided the case on relatively narrow grounds or that the public debate was largely irrelevant to the long-range issue affecting the press. Whatever may be the venerability of the doctrine of no prepublication restraint, the publication of the Pentagon Papers raised the issue in a new context which could not have been foreseen by those who wrote the First Amendment. But if the context is new, it does not necessarily invalidate the principles which have governed past conduct. What is clear is that a re-examination is in order. The circumstances of the case required that the litigation be settled within a few weeks, which was hardly an atmosphere conducive to re-examination of underlying issues. From this standpoint, the conduct of the Supreme Court was probably an exercise in wisdom in which the decision did no violence to traditional concepts of freedom of the press while the individual opinions left open the possibility of calmer assessment.

By and large, those who regard the doctrine of no prepublication restraint as absolute base their conviction upon the Areopagitica, the Zenger case, and the ultimately successful opposition to the Alien and Sedition Acts, although probably few people, including newspapermen and women, are familiar with their historical significance. They are traditional symbols for those who advocate a totally unfettered press, and they possess significance regardless of their factual content.

Their significance is that they took place when the struggle for freedom was directed against governments which thought they had an inherent right to censor the press in order to prevent dissension. The nations of Western Europe had lived with the "divine right" concept of government for so many centuries that it was difficult to emancipate men from its implications even after the concept itself had been formally renounced. So it was accepted and explicit doctrine at the time of both John Milton and John Peter Zenger (and was implicit in the Alien and Sedition Acts) that "wrong thinking" could be suppressed and that authorities were acting quite properly when they curtailed the publication of material which embarrassed them.

The public was eventually freed from the divine right concept so thoroughly (at least in the United States) that the doctrine of no prepublication restraint became deeply entrenched. If the government in June 1971 sought to suppress the publication of the Pentagon Papers on the grounds that their revelation represented heresy or embarrassment to individuals, its case would have been tossed out of court. No such accusation was made. The government's case rested upon the charge that publication would injure the nation's security and could interfere with vital foreign negotiations.

Since it was never publicly disclosed, the precise nature of the alleged injury to the national security is unclear. Nevertheless, the government was making a claim for injunctive relief on grounds which the government conceded have never been presented to the Federal courts in the past. The argument may have been old wine in a new bottle, although when the label states that the action sought is for the protection of the people of the country rather than for the protection of orthodoxy or individual members of the government, it is necessary to take another look.

Legal issues aside, it also is necessary to take into account the general background against which the government's action took place. For at least twenty-five years, the United States has regarded itself as being at "war," whether "hot" or "cold," with an alien ideology. A people who are "at war" have a tendency, rightly or wrongly, to regard the normal processes of democratic life a subordinate of the goal of victory. A plea that certain information must be suppressed to keep it from the hands of an "enemy" or to permit the formation of alliances for "survival" has a much higher degree of acceptability in such an atmosphere than it would in more placid or pacific times.

The psychology of war also fosters a trend of thought which is difficult for a group to discuss calmly. It is based upon the assumption that there are different categories of "rights"—some a matter of "survival" and others a form of "luxury." Under such an assumption, the rights granted to an individual have a tendency to wind up in the second category and those granted to the government in the first. This condition fosters a predilection for very strict enforcement of constitutional guarantees for individual right in times of serenity when such guarantees are not needed and for foregoing the "luxury" in times of stress.

This type of thinking is more likely to characterize popular debate than judicial confrontation, and no member of the Supreme Court voiced such thoughts in relation to the Pentagon Papers. But it is only one step removed to conclude that there are certain areas in which some constitutional rights are mutually exclusive, and, therefore, a choice must be made. This consideration did influence the thinking of some court members, most notably the Chief Justice when he contrasted the "imperative" of an unfettered press with the "imperative" of "effective functioning" of government. His coherent statement can fairly be said to represent the thinking of a large body of responsible men and women who do not regard themselves as in any way opposed to a free press or a free society. It deserves careful analysis.

At first glance, the statement appears unexceptionable. For at least three decades, the nation has accepted the concept that there are "secrets" which would injure the United States if they were revealed to a hostile world. Obviously, it is impossible to publish such secrets in the public press, without disclosing them to an enemy. Therefore, the right of a free press is incompatible with government effectiveness, and one must yield to the other. Once this line of reasoning is established, there seems to be little else to discuss other than the effectiveness of individual systems for maintaining the necessary secrecy while permitting the maximum degree of press freedom possible under such conditions.

It is possible to buttress this line of thought with a number of hypothetical examples which touch off emotional responses that subordinate critical analysis. Usually, they take the form of questions: Would you permit a newspaper to publish the movements of troop ships when enemy submarines are lurking offshore? Would you permit a newspaper to publish codes that would enable an enemy to learn our battle orders? Would you permit newspapers to publish stories that would reveal our weak spots in time of war? Would you permit newspapers to publish our plans of attack and the forces we are going to use?

The short and simple answer is that these questions pose only hypothetical dangers. The practicalities are well illustrated by the system of voluntary censorship set up through government-press cooperation during World War II. Despite occasional slips, usually inadvertent, these voluntary arrangements were entirely adequate to serve military necessity.

But while the dangers inherent in press freedom are largely hypothetical, the threat that would be posed to press freedom by prepublication restraints is very real. Historical experience is available, because what we now regard as the "free press" emerged only after a long struggle against licensing. The nation's founders knew what they were doing when they wrote the First Amendment. They had learned through bitter experience that no man—no matter how well-intentioned—can be entrusted with the power of censorship.

It is apparent that the doctrine of prepublication restraint can be made effective only through the use of censorship. Usually, the kind of material to which the government objects is not published in serial form. The Pentagon Papers were something of an exception in this respect, and it is unlikely that this kind of exception will occur again. If the government is really worried about its secrets, such fears can be allayed only by inspecting newspaper editions before they hit the streets. Such a practice would open nightmarish prospects for our free institutions.

The "hit-the-panic-button" type of question described above can be, and frequently is, used to discredit all of the safeguards for individual liberty built into the Constitution. We hear such rhetorical inquiries all the time:

"Would you permit a communist spy to go free just because of the Fifth Amendment?"

"Would you turn a rapist loose to harm women and children just because there were a few technical irregularities committed by the police when they arrested him?"

"Would you turn loose drug peddlers just because a policeman forgot to get a warrant before entering their flat?"

When these questions are analyzed without the distorting influence of emotion all they are really asking is whether people accused of committing a crime should be turned loose simply because their guilt cannot be technically and legally proven.

The type of reasoning implied in such questions was rejected by the framers of the Constitution. They knew that rights which are only partially safeguarded are not safeguarded at all, and that people who truly want freedom must be willing to suffer some unpleasant consequences.

Secrecy itself, moreover, involves a price and can have consequences fully as adverse as a breach of secrecy. It has become increasingly apparent that many Americans are losing confidence in governmental institutions at all levels of society. Citizens have become more interested in and more critical of the manner in which such elementary matters as zoning laws, tax assessments, the flotation of school-board bonds, the actions of city councils, and the activities of state legislatures and governments are handled. To some extent at least, this is because secrecy has become inherent in government operations, making it difficult for the average citizen to satisfy himself that his affairs are under competent and honest management.

Society must realize that any degree of secrecy entails social costs. It is up to our society to examine these costs and to determine whether they are too high to pay.

Governmental secrecy has a peculiar characteristic that stems from the absence of a known method of confining its exercise to limited areas on which reasonable persons can agree. Because classified security material cannot be examined by the public, the public cannot know whether only material essential to the nation's security is being classified. When people do not know, they tend to become suspicious. These suspicions may not assume a dangerous form when times are good and governmental policies are working well. But at the first setback—and setbacks are inevitable no matter how wise political leaders and their policies may be—the suspicions emerge as a hardened conviction that secrecy has been used to conceal blunders or even fraud and venality. At that point, the declassification and revelation of classified papers does little to restore confidence. An administration that has once resorted to unjustified secrecy can do little to assure a disaffected or skeptical electorate that it is coming clean.

A society without traditions of freedom can handle such disaffection by physical suppression. A free society is a different proposition altogether. Unity cannot be sustained by rifles and police. It requires the confidence of the electorate. Without that confidence, a free government becomes ineffective.

The cost of secrecy is not confined solely to the breeding of suspicion that the government is playing fast and loose with the public trust. It is also a device for cutting off the public debate through which the citizens of a nation prepare themselves for the consequences of great decisions which may mean considerable sacrifice. Nowhere is this better illustrated than in the Pentagon Papers.

The significance of the Pentagon Papers to historians is highly debatable. Whether they shed light on the entry of the United States as a military force into Vietnam is something that cannot, at this point, be determined. But they are unquestionably revealing in terms of the quality of discussion which governed that entry. The most notable characteristic of the passionate debate which was going on within governmental circles is that it took place virtually out of sight and earshot of the public. The American people had only the faintest inklings of the facts and the decisions which were to determine their destiny.

Furthermore, the debate was not conducted under circumstances which fostered calm judgment. Within the government itself, only a relative handful of people were privy to all the facts and options. Yet even this handful were conducting themselves under circumstances which violated all the rules of adversary discussion. They were in a position to write memoranda but could not be certain who would read them or what effect they would have. They did not confront contrary points of view in situations where they could find out what arguments they had to counter. They had no real chance to test their own thinking against others.

In this connection, the Pentagon Papers provide an ironic example of the ultimate futility of secrecy. The papers were put together as a result of Secretary McNamara's request for a study to assist future policy planners in avoiding mistakes made in Vietnam. Once the documents were assembled, fifteen copies were printed and locked up where it was highly unlikely that any future planners would even see them. It is difficult to regard this procedure as a satisfactory method for learning from history.

One function of public debate is to test ideas in the marketplace of thought. Another function is to prepare people psychologically for stormy days ahead. In regard to the Vietnamese war, neither function was carried out. On the contrary, all informed discussions took place under a "security" tent. This process left the public in the bewildering position of finding itself involved in a major conflict with no idea of how it got into it or what it was fighting for. Did the United States gain enough advantages from its policy of secrecy to justify the price in loss of public confidence? On balance, has the secrecy that was practiced strengthened or weakened the nation?

The members of the Supreme Court addressed themselves to the propriety of the specific classifications of the Pentagon Papers and to the rights of the government to seek injunctive relief. The task force urges the nation to ponder a broader question—the wisdom of unchecked secrecy itself.

The task force does not propose the abolition of the security classification system, although we favor a serious study of it by a disinterested group. We are well aware that government of any character will continue to practice secrecy—for good or for bad reasons—in many of its operations. Government officials are human beings, and humans generally assume they have a right to privacy in the conduct of their affairs. It is difficult to convince a person that he does NOT have that right simply because his affairs are in a public domain.

Excessive secrecy is inimical to a free society and should be combated. But we doubt that a law by itself can guarantee public inspection of the conduct of public business. The task force believes that an effective and essential instrument to achieve this end is a free and responsible press—free to investigate; free to interrogate; and free to publish.

When we weigh the imperative of secrecy against the imperative of an effective government in a free society, we believe that the balance is more heavily weighted in favor of the latter.

Admittedly, a free press is a troublesome institution. It can be, and frequently is, arrogant, obnoxious, wrong-headed. We have no illusions as to its reluctance to correct its own faults. But none of its defects is so grave as to justify the abridgment of freedom. Liberty is far too precious to be abandoned out of fear of unpleasant consequences.

Basic to freedom is the right to publish. Obviously, this is a right which entails risks—as does every other right in a free society. The founding fathers did not present the Constitution as a document to ensure a painless world. They claimed that it would safeguard liberty, which they considered a fundamental objective.

The task force has neither seen nor heard persuasive evidence that a free press will bring about the downfall of our nation. That latter condition is much more likely to come about through efforts of overly zealous government officials to protect the public from knowledge of how the public's business is transacted.

But we have seen and heard persuasive evidence that a free government can be effective only when it has the confidence of its citizens. The free press is the most effective instrument known to sustain that confidence. Therefore, a majority of the task force urges that our leaders regard the doctrine of no prepublication restraint as absolute. No matter what the difficulties, that long-term result will be a stronger and more united nation.[11]

CONCLUSION

When we met for the first time, the members of the task force possessed a wide variety of backgrounds and views on the problems of governmental power and press freedom. But all of us had already concluded from our observations of recent public events that new and potentially corrosive frictions were rising between the news media and the government. At the conclusion of our deliberations, we could appraise with precision the extent of the threat to press freedom. However, we achieved a consensus that some degree of damage to press freedom is posed by each of the five subjects discussed in this report: press subpoenas, police posing as newsmen, official harassment of the underground press, governmental investigations in the regulated broadcast media, and attempted prior restraint of publication.

Moreover, we share a feeling that press freedom might be more fragile than is widely assumed—and that its role in American democracy is so crucial that the nation cannot afford to risk its erosion. The fundamental truth about the constitutionally protected status of the press is that it exists for the public, not the press. As the late Justice Hugo L. Black put it in his opinion in the Pentagon Papers case: "In the First Amendment the founding fathers gave the free press the protection it must have to fufill its essential role in our democracy. . . . The press was protected so that it could bare the secrets of government and inform the people. Only a free and unrestrained press can effectively expose deception in government."

If this principle were widely understood and vigorously defended by the public, there would be little cause for concern in governmental rumblings against the press. To act against the press would then be viewed by the people as a thrust against them, and politicians would hesitate to do so.

But the public's reaction to some recent events reveals that many people do not consider that press freedom includes the obligation to report truths that are repugnant to a critical government. Public-opinion polls disclose that the public's patience with such journalism is dangerously thin—that many, if not a majority, of the people believe that the press is being either irresponsible or unpatriotic when it publishes material that the government feels should not be made public.

At the same time a large segment of the public has come to have as many reservations about government as about the press, as witness all the talk about "credibility gaps." Furthermore, the feeling that government policies and political leaders are increasingly being "sold" to the public by one cosmetic technique or another has led to wariness and suspicion of those policies and leaders. Thus there is an ambivalent erosion of confidence in the institutions that are supposed to represent the public, making the media as much victims as reporters of news events. If the press reports dissent, it is held also to be the vehicle of dissent; yet if it does not report, it is not doing its constitutional duty to serve as the bulwark against arbitrary government. This exacerbates tensions between government and press.

[11] Judge Williams, Mr. Early and Mr. Rock dissent from this position. Mr. de Toledano comments in a footnote.

The public must recognize, as the men and women who fought for the Bill of Rights recognized, that a free and independent press is vital to a free people. In the last analysis, the public has the most to lose from a whittling away of the safeguards that have, since the founding of the nation, preserved and protected the invaluable tradition of a free press. It is therefore incumbent on the media continually to reaffirm their role in a democracy and to resist any infringement by government on their constitutional rights. For this, the courts are always open. At the same time, the media must also adhere fully to their responsibility to be an open conduit of information to the public. It is this above all that will make the maintenance of a free press not a cherished cliché but the cornerstone of a free society.
